LONDON READER

of Literature, Science, Art, and General Enformation.

[ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.]

No. 1354.-VOL. LIL.]

1889.

lbe, an ex-sed of one id potassa, oe of rose-a lotion on ing.

ilks may ap, a tea-all well ah side of a two or will look delicate ing your e cannot him the before . If the cane one gallon ince of three-emons overed yeast, excite strain , then iss. 2. ms of uised, ounds

OR OF

FOR THE WEEK ENDING APRIL 13, 1889.

[PRICE ONE PERMY.

[IT WAS THE PORTRAIT OF HER HUSBAND WHOM SHE HAD FORSAKEN—JOEN DREW!]

A FEARFUL SECRET.

CHAPTER VI.

JANETA LEIGH had many faul's, but there was the making of a good, true woman in her, despite her ambition and the wild impulses of her undisciplined heart. Love would have softened and developed her, but unfortunately her longing for riches, her yearning desire to escape from the trials of poverty, had hurrled her into a terrible mistake which must make love heneforwards an unknown word to her. love henceforward an unknown word to her.

love henceforward an unknown word to her. Had she been a better woman or a worse, Nettie would have stayed with Mr. Drew, and made the best of her mistake.

A tender, self sacrificing, Griselda type of girl would have clung to her husband in spite of all, and done her utmost to make the best of his evil fortunes and smooth his troubles. A mercenary, heartless woman would have argued she was his wife, and he was bound to support her somehow. At the very worst she was safe from working for her bread.

But Janeta Leigh—the old name must cling to her still—could take neither of these courses. She had been deceived, and hers was not a character ever to trust a second time where she had once been disappointed. Besides, she reasoned, she had been perfectly frank with her suitor. She had told him again and again she was penniless. She had assured him, though she liked and esteemed him, she did not love

John Drew had wilfully mistaken her meaning, and had palmed himself off on her as his titled cousin.
After that, to live at his side—to owe her maintenance to him—would have been as gall maintenance to him—would have been as gall to her pride.

Besides, hedidnot want her. Though he tried afterwards to dissemble in the first surprise of his discovery he had let her see plainly a penniless wife was a terrible encumbrance to him, and Janeta would have died rather than have shared his life after this.
She waited until he had gone to his club, then she dressed herself quietly and went out. There was no appearance of haste or secrecy about her departure. She met the landlady on the stairs, and remarked on the weather with perfect equanimity.

It was only when she had left Cecil-street behind her, and reached the quiet shelter of a corner of the ladies' waiting-room at Charing Cross that she sat down to analyse her position.

We have called her refuge quiet, and it was so in one sense. There was no one to interfere with Janeta, no one to question or disturb her. In a great sorrow there is no isolation so complete, no solitude more soothing, than to sit alone amid a busy crowd, among them but not of them. To see the seething rushing tide of hu-manity sweeping past us. To feel how vast is the world around teaches us, I think, better than world around teaches us, I think, better than anything else, that no simple person, be they bitter enemy or dearly loved friend, has a right to spoil our life.

It is ours to make or mar. Happiness may be denied us, but it is still in our power to shun the people who cause our misery.

Nettie sat down and thought over her future. Six hours before she had expected to see herself a percess the wife of one of the see herself a peeress, the wife of one of the richest noblemen in England; now she was as poor and friendless as before she went to Dor-bury, and burdened with a secret which she must hide from all the world. She was to young; the knew so little of life and its mysteries of the human heart and its passions that it actually seemed to he girl, if she could only keep her storet, and prevent any one flading out about the ceremony at that grim old city church, it did not matter so very much after all. The world was wide. She and John Drew need never meet. It only meant that she must work hard all her life time. Never now would she make her fortune by a rich marriage.

The clock struck four, and poor Nettie roused herself to face the problem of her fature.

She did not think the had mentioned Alice Hutton's name to Mr. Drew. He only knew she was staying with a "friend in Brixton," far too vague a blue for him to try to trace

On the other hand, he had heard all about Miss Spargo and the school at Normanton.
From that lady it would be easy enough for him to make inquiries; but James renembered guidly that Buren Spargo was her staunch friend, and would hardly refuse a request of hers.

request of hers.

The spinster had already promised not to mention Mrs. Carlyle's situation to Nettle's aunt or anyone at Normanon until it was actually settled. A hint to her and she would refuse absolutely to see Mr. Drew, should be call; the secret might be kept after all.

But Jameta was not found of leaving things to chance. She select the attendant for writing meterials, and with sching heart began a letter to be showed.

Is was the the despiting ory of a creature in mortal pain; short, abrupt, and and, but for all that is had a strange touch of pathos, as written words when they dome straight from an aching heart cannot fail to have.

"You have wreaked my life, ended my girl ish hopes. I amgoing where I shall be sale from you; where no one can find me! You will never be troubled by me any more; you will be free in all things, but one last prayer I will be free in all things, but one last prayer I have to make: do not tell anyone who knew me have to make: do not tell anyone who inew me of our meeting to day. Les Nathalie still enjoy the memory of her happy days at Dorbury, without guessing the coatly price I paid for them. Don't let files sipargo know the terrible fate of her favourite pupil. It is my one request, my last prayer, Grain it for your sake and mine, or surely the ourse of one you have so cruelly injured will haunt you all your dave."

Sie fastened the letter, and directed it to Mr. Drew's club; then, after she had slipped it into the pillar box, she took an omnibus for Waterloo.

Her mind was quite made up; she would pass a sponge over the events of the morning, and go straight to Richmond as though she had never had any object in coming to London but to beg for the post of Mrs. Carlyle's companion.

Alice Hutton, the kindest and least exacting of women, could easily be told that by the time Janeta's business in London was over, it seemed too late to return to Brixton before the expedition to Richmond.

A superatitious person would have called it a good omen that she just caught the express train to Richmond, and reached the beautiful Sarrey resort a few moments before five.

Janeta was not superstitious, and her only feeling as she alighted on the platform was a hope that Mrs. Carlyle would engage her.

She had no special desire to live with that lady for her own sake, but she shrank from even a temporary return to Normanton Hall, because Nathalie would be sure to talk of their pleasant days at Dorbury, and her dear Mr.

The girl whose fate had been so unpropitions felt, as she reached the Star and Garter, she would rather go to Hillington, were Mrs. Carlyle the fiercest of viragos, than risk the questioning gape of Nathalie's dear, childish, eyes. Mis. Carlyle was at home, and Janets was nahered into her private sitting-room, without

She had made so sure also would never need. the situation that our heroine had herself very little about its duties. She could only recall that Mrs. Carlyle was a widow, and

The last companion had left to be married -a fate Nettie decided, with a grim smile, which certainly could not happen to her.

The solt frou frou of a silken dress, and someone came in.

Janeta felt a vague regret she had not seen Mrs. Carlyle before she married John Drew. A home with that low-voiced, sweet-faced woman might have tempted her to give up her

Mrs. Carlyle was much under filty, and still bore the traces of great beauty. Her complexion was as fair and smooth as a girl's, and though a tiny lace my rected on her rich, brown hair, no one would have called

She wore a rich black sifk dress, very plainly

She were a rich black silk dress, very plainly made, but the roffles at her neck and wrists were of rare old less. There was a diagonal brooch at her threat, and the hand she offered to Janeta was addressed by two or three sings of almost priceless value.

"I am very plant decreey out, Min Lulph," she said, quistly. "I have been writhout a companion nearly a ricouth, and I am addressed to find one, but I would much a mer have a friend of Min. Entton than a wranger, to I hope you will not be frightened at the thought of a relies country life."

of a quiet sountry life."

Newie felt ready to my. It was the first time anyone had upoken to her in that gould notherly way.

Miss Spargo had been kind to be, but the schools like was a spinster. She had not that large tenderness of heart, that instinctive sympathy, which only comes, I think, to women who have passed through the joys and women who have present virtuely the property of the second to you vary much," said Nettie, "but I have no idea, what the diffice of a compassion are; and I am afraid I am very dull," "Hen came a hind of shaked nob in her voice. "I have been doing become all my life till last August. I don't seem to have had time to learn to be bright and sheer that".

Mrs. Ourlyle a

Mrs. Carlyle smiled.

"My dear, I think people who are purpoinally observint, and what one may call segrenalterly lively, area great trial. There must be juy and serrow in every life. I should not like a companion who thought it necessary always to be laughing. Mrs. Hutton tells me you play and sing; that you would not object to reading aloud and answering letters for me.
These are the chief recuriements." These are the chief requirements."
"I can do all those," said Netti said Nettie, brighten-"and I understand cooking and house-Reeping. I believe I am clever at millinery. But, Mrs. Carlyle, people never like me. I can't explain it to you, but they don't."

"Mrs. Hutton likes you."

"Oh, yes, and Miss Spargo, too; but none of the girls at Normanton Hall liked me.
They said I was cold and disagreeable. You see "and Native years are almost and hall liked me. se," and Nettie's voice grew almost pathetic, I never can think of pleasant things to talk abut, and so very often I never talk at all."

"I am not atraid of your being atways silent." replied Mrs. Carlyle; 'and I will tell you, Misa Leigh, one reason why I think we shall be friends. Long ago, when I was on a visit to one of my sisters, I was very much taken with her governess. It must be twenty years nearly since that time, but I spent three months in the house with Miss Tremains, and I loved her dearly—almost like a sister. I and I loved her dearly—almost like a stater. I married, and went to India with my husband for three years. Our correspondence languished, and soon died out; but when I came home I did my best to discover my dear Lucy. I did my best to discover my dear Lucy. I would never find her, and my sister could tell repeating a lesson learned by rote. "We me nothing of her; but though the years have come and gone, Miss Leigh, I have never for gotten my girlhood's friend, and the moment I saw you I felt reminded or her."

"And it is no wonder, for I am her child," said Nestie, blue hing. "At least, my mother a maiden name was Lucy Tremaine, and I always heard she was a governess till she

Mrs. Carlyle's eyes filled.

"You speak as though are were dead?"
"She has been dead for years. I can only just remember her, and how good and gentle she was."
"You are very like her."

"Not in character," confessed Janeta. "I think my mother must have been all heart, and I am quite sure I have no heart at all."

"I lean's believe that; but your being Lucy Tremaine's child quite decides the matter as far as I am concerned. My dear, do you think you can be happy with your mother's old

It was on Janeta's lips to my she should never be happy again, but she kept back that rather desponding statement, and snawered,— "I should like of all things to come to you.

"Then can you join me on Monday? I had dised to go beens then, but I will wait here a few days longer if that will herry you too much."

shook her head.

all be quite ready by Monday."

have forgotten what some people all the most important point," said to be presently, "We have said not a all give you a ford about a year for your pr n Whinking

note, Wit mother

"Do you know, Nettie, you owe your name to me? I, too, was christened Janets, and called Nettie. It must have been in memory of her old felled your mether close that name for how living pill." "Takenya liked it," and Janeta, alowly. "And your father, is he alive?"
"He has married again, and lives at Band-

The has married again, and three at Sandford."

"Why, that is only swenty miles from us?
Perhaps, so Captain Loish lives at Sandford, you have been over to Hillington?"

"I haver wan in Yorkshire in my life."

"Then your father has only just gone there?"

"He has been there eaven years," and she never tried to check the bitterness in her voice, "but he has never offered for me to visit him. Perhaps it is his wife's fault. have never seen her, but I believe she is quite young, and might object to a grown-up stepdaughter."

You speak sadly, Nettie, as though the world had been a very hard place to you."

"It has been," asserted Nettie, simply. "I seem to have been an outcast all my life. I never did anyone any harm that I remember, but yet, between me and all things bright and pleasant, there has seemed a great gulf fixed."

The short September day was waning, and the sky was red with the last gillnmer of sunset, when Miss Leigh returned to Brixton. Alice Rutton herself opened the door, a great anxiety on her face.

"My dear Nettle, I have been expecting you for hours."

I could not belp it," said Janeta, "I could not help it," said Janess, our strainedly, for there was much in that day's doings ahe must hide at any cost from her friend. "Indeed, Alice, I did not mean to come home solate, but the time passed quickly.

hava-

for nent

ıı bli

her's

d I

she

ntle

66 T

eart,

HOV

nink that

d. __

had

8-0

aid

HW9

ty's

ng.

ne

be to phe

er,

of

at

to

¢$

12

are to go down to Hillington by the ten o'clock are to go down the swilling to give a hundred a-year for the pleasure of my society."

Bat you don't like her.

"What makes you think that?"
"Your voice. I know you of old, Nettie, and I am cartain you only speak in that cold, sercestic way because you are afraid of breaking down altogether, and being natural enough to cry."

to cry."
She spoke in all kindness; but her words were that proverbial last straw which breaks the camel's back.

Janeta's composure gave way; she buried her face in her hands, and sobbed like a little child. Alice Hutton bent over her tenderly as a sister, trying by every means to soothe her, but in vain.

batin vain.

"You shall not go to Yorkshire, dear," she urged, "If the idea vexes you. We thought you would be happy with Mrs. Carlyle, because my sister was; but girls are different. Stay with us till you hear of semeone you like better. Remember, Arthur and I are only too glad to have you, and Miss Spargo wrote to me that she had always a home for you at the Hall; so you see, Nettie, there is not the least need for you to go to Hillington against your will."

Janeta dried her eyes, and tried hard to be calm.

"I want to go to Hillington," she said, slowly, "and I like Mrs. Carlyle very much; but, Alice, I do so wish I had met her sooner!"

Mrs. Hutton had one fault; she was a little

Mrs. Hutton had one fault; he was a little too matter of fact, given, so to speak, to take everything too literally.

"But, dear, your education was only finished in July I Your father would never have allowed you to take a situation sconer."

"You don't understand. All these years, ever since I, came to Aunt Tremsine's, I have just of the property of the property have just gone on getting harder and harder. No one liked me but Miss Sparge, and I thought her affection was only pity. Alice, my heart was just turned to atone from want of loving and being loved."

Alice bent and kissed her. This revelation from the proud, reserved Janeta touched her deeply.

"And you think you could have loved Mrs.
Carlyle?"

"She was my mother's friend. They were cirls together. Ever since she came to England she has been trying to find out my mother! And I am called after her. She is another Janeta."

"Then it seems to me, Janeta, your sorrows are ended. Mrs. Carlyle will treat you almost as her own child. You will never be lonely or unloved again. The clouds have relied back from your sky, dear, and left nothing but sun-

A yearning came upon poor Janeta to tell her seemst. Already it weighed heavily on her mind, and Alice's sympathy would have been very precious. But she kept silent, partly from shame, and a little because whe feared Mrs. Hutton would held that her right place was at her husband's side.

It was strange that when she went to bed she never shought of the man she had married, never wondered how he bore the news of her loss. Her mind was full of her own future and of plans for keeping her secret; yet just before sleep closed her weary eyes there dashed upon her a recollection of the stranger she had met in the train only the day before, and his creed that every one depends for happiness on their own conduct; that to be true and honest is all that matters since we can run away from all outside enemies, but can never escape the verdict of our own conscience. What would be think of her now?

A strange pain filled the poor girl's heart. It seemed to her she could never hold up her head again since now she had a turned down page in her life — a secret whose discovery she dreaded.

She wrote to Miss Sparge the next day, as in day bound, to tell of her success. It was a difficult letter to write; but Jameta achieved it. She thanked the schoolmistress for all her kinduess, and begged her as a last favour not to tell the little world of Normanton where she had gone.

"I know," wrote Janeta, "my petition may seem strange to you; but you know my life at Normanton was practically a failure. No one loved me but you and Nathalie. In a strange place I might make a fresh start, if I was sure no one would identify Mrs. Carlyle's companion with the shabby, awk. ward girl, whose pride and ungracious temper you bore with so patiently."

Miss Spargo answered the letter by return of post. She congratulated Nettie warmly on her prospects—told her Mrs. Tremaine had been so enraged at losing her unpaid slave that she had not cared to make the least inquiry of her niece's future. She should tell the girls only that Janeta had a cituation in the country, and she only hoped the fresh start would be the beginning of a happier life for her favourite.

It was a very kind letter. It enclosed a girlish serawl from Nathalie, full of regrets for dear old Dorbury, and wonders whether she should ever see "Mr. John" again; but she should ever see "Mr. John" again; but the sigh of satisfaction with which Nettie put her correspondence in her pocket was not caused by Miss Spargo's kindness or Nathalie's affection, but by the certainty her husband had granted her request, and made no attempt to trace her at Ner-

Both letters were written on Sanday, and if John Drew had intended to cross-examine Miss Spargo about his runaway wife he would have done so wishin twenty-four hours of her flight. It never occurred to Nettie that he might think she had taken her own life—that the very wording of her passionate note might well justify the idea!

She had only room for the one thought-he had obeyed her desire. He would keep silence about the twenty minutes they had spent together in a arian old city church. She had nothing to fear from him, and but for the gold wedding ring, looked away in her deak, there was nothing to remind her of the past.

Dr. Hatton decided his patients must be content to do without him till eleven colock, and he himself esecred Janeta to o'clock, and he himself escrited Janeta to King's Cross. He had been very much struck with his wife's Iriend. Nettie had been in his house only four days, but this keen, dlear-headed man understood her better than anyone had yet done. He felt she had in her the making of something very good or very

For Janeta mediogrity was impossible. She looked like a woman who must have a history. The young doctor could not have explained it, but he seemed to know by instinct Miss Leigh's future course would not be the happy, commonplace security of his own wife's. There would be joy and sorrow in store for Janeta, and a terrible stroggle between right and wrong.

and wrong.
"You must pay us a longer visit next time," he said cheerfully to Notitie, as they reached King's Cross; "and remember, Miss Leigh, if ever trouble touches you, come to my wife. Alice is very staunch, and she will always be your friend!"

Nettie gave him a grateful glance from her beautiful eyes, but yet his speech or the word-ing of it troubled her strangely.

Do you think, then, sorrow is in store for

"I hope not. From what Alice mys I should think you had had enough already; but remember, Miss Leigh, if the clouds return you will always find a welcome at

Mre. Carlyle was there before them, and leaving Janeta in her care the doctor re-turned to Brixton, his first words to his wife a hope that her friend would be very happy in Voekshire.

"I am sure of it. Mrs. Carlyle is kindness itself, and Nettie must grow fond of her."
The dooter shrugged his shoulders.

"Arthur! Don's you like my poor little Nettie?"

So much, dear, that I hope you may prove right; and a few calm, peausful yours in Yorksbire by Mass Leigh's portion—but I doubt it.

"And why? Mrs. Carlyle is not capricious or changeable!"

"No; but unless I am mistaken, there is a secret in Miss Leigh's life; and Mrs. Carlyle is the last woman in the world to forgive anyone who deceived her."

Janeta is above deceit."

"But some people call concealing the truth as much deceit as departing from it."

"Arthur! You quite frighten me. Do tell me what you mean?

"It is nothing dear; only you recollect how struck my friend Greville seemed with Mes Letiah ?"

I thought he had fallen in love with her at first sight," replied Atios, smiling,

"It seems he went up to Lindon by the same train as the did on Friday morning, and Ludgate-hill railway station she was met by a gentleman."

"Her consin, of course?"
"A man not far from thirty. Now, Aline, the eldest of Mrs. Tremsine's boys can't be over twenty-one."

"Mr. Greville must have been mistaken."

"I think not. Remember how excited the was about that trip to London, how silent she was as to its object. Then, instead of arming home to dinner and starting from here for Richmond in the afternoon she spent the day in London."

"She was at Richmond by five."

"And in London at ten. From ten till four gives a long day. Alice don's look at me so reproachfuly. I am not exting the word against Miss Leigh, but I betters beat she has a lover whose existence and had not thought it needful to mention to Mrs.

"Why shouldn't she have a lover?" de-manded Alice. "I was younger than Nettre, sir, when you asked me to be your wife." Dr. Hutton kissed her for the restellection. "But the cases are not similar. Alice, there was nothing claudestine about our engagement."

"I think you are hard on her, Arthur," persisted Alice. "She may just have met company ten minutes." It seemed strangs to Janeta Leigh, that after dreaming of a honeymoon in Yorkehire, tate should send her to the self-same county. as a bumble companion, not what there was anything in the least suggestive of inferiority in the treatment she received.

Mrs. Carlyle treated her more as a favourite guess, and throughout the long journey seemed more anxious for her comfort then her own. The confidential maid who was in. attendance waited on Miss Leigh as respect. folly as on her mistress; and when the tarties-left the train at York for lunch none of the people in the spacious refreshment hall would have dreamed from seeing them together their respective relations.

"Are you not tired, Nattie?" said Mrs. Carlyle, as she stirred her ouffee. "It is a terrible journey from London to Hilliegren, but I always say it is worth it. My home is so beautiful!"

"Is Hillington the name of the village, or only of your house?" saked Netrie.
"The name of both. Hillington village boasts three shops, a post office, a church, and a doctor, besides sustered cottages and farm-houses. My home is called Hittington Pace, properly speaking, but most people teaws out one-balf of its title. My London friends atways call its simply Hillington, while my neighbours speak of its imply as the Place."

"And have you lived there long?" asked Janets, who was not at all inquisitive; but wished to seem interested in one who was so kind to her.

"More than fifteen years. We returned from India when my husband came into the property. We had no children," she said, with a heavy sigh, "and so he left me Hill-ington Place for my life, with the provise I was to bequeath it to one of his kindred. His relations are so numerous that I need be in no difficulty to find a successor; but I confess as yet I have shrunk from the task. I do not even know all his nephews, and his cousins are so plentiful I have never counted them up. My lawyer is always urging me to make a will, but I keep putting it off."

"And do the relations all come and try to please you?" inquired Miss Leigh. "It must be perplexing."

"Some come; others are proud, and shun me lest I should fancy they want my property. I am not sure but what I like those best. I often wish my husband had left a different will; but he had been abroad ever since his boyhood, and died only aix months after our He knew next to nothing of his own return. relations, and perhaps he thought the choice would be a little occupation for him."

"I should ohoose the one most like Mr. Carlyle, or one called after him."

"My dear, they are none of them like him, and Geoffrey is such a family name with us. and Geolifey is such a family name with us.

There must be at least a dozen Carlyles who bear it, to say nothing of his sister's sons.

My husband was the eldest of twelve, and the only one who died childless, so you may imagine how extensive my choice is."

They were soon taking their seats for Hillington, where they hoped to arrive by six o'clock

o'clock

Mrs. Carlyle told Janeta she trusted it would be a happy home for her, and that she would try to forget she was motherless.

"You are so kind," whispered Nettie. "If only I had known you long ago how much brighter my life might have been!"

"Well, love, we have lost a few years of each other's friendship; but I hope a great many remain to us. You will soon look atronger, Nettie, in our beautiful north-country air."

Janeta had a question hovering on her lips.

"Mrs. Carlyle, if you have nieces won't they be angry at your being so kind to me?"

"My dear Nettie," said the widow, laughing, "I have—or rather the Major had—a round dozen of nieces, but I gave out long ago that I couldn't have a dozen companions considered it unfair to select one and disap-point her eleven cousins. My companions have hitherto been great favourities with my relatives, whose jealousy you perceive is not of strangers, but of each other. All the family know that the Place, its furniture and income, plate, jewels, carriages, and horses must come to one of them. My own savings, and anything I have bought since my husband's death, of course belong to me absolutely; but these spoils are too small to attract the attention of people who aspire to thirty thousand a year!"

"Thirty thousand a year!" breathed Janeta, awe struck." Have you really such an enormous income? "

"Yes;" replied her friend; "but you need not envy me, dear. I would have faced the world without a penny could it have prolonged my husband's life. I would have resigned every shilling of his property could he but have left me in its stead a little child!"

Nettie pressed her hand.

The train was punctual to a minute; but Nettie decided Hillington must be a far more important place than she had imagined, for quite a dozen people stood on the platform, and all seemed to belong to the upper ten.

Miss Leigh would have said two pas were the utmost that could be expected from that little rustic station.

It was only a short train (a very few carrisges "made up" at the last junction as sufficient for this little used, unimportant line); but still it seemed to Janeta all the little group of passengers need not have made in a body for their carriage, since six was the limit of its accommodation; but a surprise awaited her.

A very stout, elderly gentleman flung open the door, and standing bare-headed on the steps. seized Mrs. Carlyle's hand, crying,— "Welcome home, sister!"

A thin, and it must be confessed rather vinegar-faced, lady, soon pushed him away, and claimed her innings.

"I am rejoiced, dearest Janeta, to see you safely back. The dear girls are all here to welcome you, and—"

Mrs. Carlyle out this harangue short.

"If you'll kindly stand aside, Susan, I should like to get out; neither of us wish to be carried on to Whitby, and the train is just starting.

starting." abashed, retreated, and Mrs. Carlyle got out of the carriage, refusing all offers of assistance, which were at once transferred to Janeta.

Miss Leigh never felt sure how many people aided her safe progress to the ground; and when she turned to look for her bag she discovered a tall, maypole of a boy hugging it, while her umbrells and rugs were safe in someone else's keeping.

Altogether, fourteen relatives had come to meet Mrs. Carlyle: Uncle Augustus (the stout gentleman) and two of his boys; Aunt Susan, and five girls, while the rest of the number consisted of stray nephews and cousins, who had managed somehow to spare time to assist at their wealthy relative's arrival.

This is terrible !" whispered Mrs. Carlyle "Ans is terrible?" whispered hirs. Caryle to Janeta when, at the mention of the carriage, half a dozen relatives had flown to hasten
it. "They all expect to be asked to dinner."
"All?" Janet smiled. "But would the cook have enough for them to eat?

"I dare not ask one without the other. I must think."

Only a moment, and she was smiling sweetly on her capacious brother in-law.

"Augustus, I am too tired to talk to anyone to night; but I do hope you and the boys will come up to dinner to-morrow." Then, as Aunt Susan began to look ominously grave, "I shall be so pleased to see you all," she gave a comprehensive smile, which included even the cousins. "It seems a long time since I was at home. Ah!" as delighted accept-ances began to be uttered; "then I shall expect everyone at seven exactly."

Uncle Augustus handed her to the carriage; Aunt Susan wrapped her shawl round her; the younger generation performed various minor services, and then the word of command was given, the beautiful bay horses dashed off at a quick trot, and poor Mrs. Carlyle was free from her relations.

For a few moments there was perfect silence; then the widow took Nettie's hand.

"My dear child, you seemed to think me a very enviable person when you heard I had thirty thousand a year. Don't you pity me

"But you need not live here," persisted ettie. "You might go away, and live quietly somewhere else.

Mrs. Carlyle shook her head.

"Property has its duties, my dear ! I should not like to neglect mine; but, you see, wealth has drawbacks."

"Are they so very poor?" asked Nettie.
"Augustus Carlyle has seven hundred a-ear. He is the Vicar of Hellington, and I year. He is the Vicar of Hellington, and I really think a good man; but he has a large family, and I suppose has grown to think one of his boys ought to be my heir. Susan Beden I am really sorry for. She is an officer's widow, with very scanty means; and she has seven daughters, the plainest and most uninteresting girls you ever saw."

"And do they always behave like that?"

"They never show to advantage together.

"They never show to advantage together.

I like my relations best in instalments; but you see they all expected to come to dinner, so I could not make exceptions. I should not wonder, Nettie, if you liked some of them very much when you get used to their little ways." Janeta shook her head.

"I am sure I shall not."

"Poor things!" said Mrs. Carlyle, gently.
"It is vary sad to see them so eager for money; but, Janeta, at least they are open about it. They never try to hide their hopes. about it. They never sty to hind state inches I confess I can pardon anything better than concealment; it seems to me only another name for deceit!"

A five miles drive brought them to Hilling.

ton Place

Janet Leigh almost forgave the oupidity of Mrs. Carlyle's relations when she saw the grand old house nestling among venerable trees, where the woodman's axe had not been heard for centuries.

Mrs. Carlyle spent her money lavishly, and the place was kept up sumptuously.

The lawns were smooth and even as velvet; the grounds were bright with innumerable flowers, while the roses, the orchards, and the hothouses were celebrated for miles round.

The house itself was of stone, brown and grey, with the dust of centuries. One side was almost covered by ivy. A kind of terrace, or verandah, ran on every side; but on three it had been roofed in entirely with glass, so as to form a sort of winter-garden.

The carriage stopped at the centre of the fourth side. A flight of rugged steps led up to the terrace just in front of the grand entrance.

The door stood open, as was the custom, from early morning till the hour of evening prayers, when the butler presented the keys to his lady on a silver salver.

Within was a square hall provided with a table, chairs, and various newspapers. At one angle was a kind of office with a glass front, not so much unlike the box office of a theatre. Here a servant always sat. He was styled the porter; and it was his province to take messages, receive letters, and answer ques-tions; while, in the case of visitors, he rang a bell, which sounded straight into the butler's

The porter had a good salary, and occupied a cottage in the grounds. His hours were from nine till eight. Before and after those times a footman was always on duty in the hall. The object of having the porter was that, in days gone by, the hall had been a favourite gathering place for guests who would not have cared for a servant in their midst, while the cortex is his little office was quite and of their porter in his little office was quite out of their way.

Janeta only learned these particulars gradu-ally. This first night she did not even see the porter; she only noticed the dark cak floor, covered with bright eastern rugs, the flowers in old china pots standing about at intervals, and the crowd of servants gathered to receive their lady—the butler looking as much a gentleman as some of Mrs. Tremaine's lodgers marshalling the men, the housekeeper, in black silk and starched apron, heading the maids.

Mrs. Carlyle had a kindly word for each, shaking hands with Mr. and Mrs. Hill.
"This is my dear friend, Miss Leigh!" she said quietly, indicating Janeta. "I know you will do your best to make her comfortable at Hillington," she said to the old housekeeper.

Hill smiled assent, struck, perhaps, by the strange dignity and aristocratic bearing of the stranger.

the stranger.

"I have had the blue-rooms prepared for the young lady, madam, and I thought Nancy should wait on her for the present."

The blue rooms were the prettiest Nettie had ever occupied. They seemed to be fit for a queen; and Nancy was a bright, handy girl, who served her with respectful attention, and seemed to the a pleasure in argencing. and seemed to take a pleasure in arranging the masses of red-gold hair. "Dinner will not be for half-an-hour, miss,"

she said, when her task was ended. "Mrs. Carlyle likes to rest a little when she has come off a journey. Will you wait here, or shall I show you the way to the drawing room?"

Nettle elected to go to the drawing-room,

B9.

ently. er for open than other

Illing.

ity of rable been and lvet;

rah!

i the

and

Bida

18.0e.

488, the p to noe.

om.

ing

re.

ka

and ensounced herself in a luxurious of air near the centre table.

Left alone, she looked around the beautiful room with a sigh of pure content.

She did so love all that was bright and atand so love all that was bright and attractive, this poor little lonely child. It seemed to Janeta people who had pretty things around them must surely grow good just by looking at them. She had a sensitive, artistic nature, and the long, lofty room, furnished in pale blue and ebony, charmed her taste.

pale bue and ebony, charmed her taste.

Down one side were seven French windows opening on to the terrace or winter garden.

The others were hung with curtains of pale blue silk, interspersed with fine venetian mirrors, let in to the wall from floor to ceiling. One recess was quite filled with old china; another contained a miniature grotto and fernery.

fernery.

And such a house might have been hers!

Alandyke was probably as grand as Hillington

Janeta gave one sigh for the position she had once fancied her own; and then, determined to banish sad thoughts, she took up an album and began to turn over the leaves.

She was not fond of photographs, but in this case she felt interested in them.

Mrs. Carlyle's story had taken a great hold on her imagination. She believed the should recognise the "kindred," from other people by recognise the "kindred," from other people by their anxious, expectant look; but in this she failed. The book though it certainly contained the portrait of Uncle Augustus and his boys, was also honoured by a picture of Alice Hutton and her sister. Clearly, therefore, Mrs. Carlyle did not put the "candidates for wealth" in an album by themselves, and Janeta found her powers of guessing them by instinct fail. The album was for the most part filled with the photographs of fine-looking men and gentle, attractive women; but part filled with the photographs of fine-looking men and gentle, stiractive women; but they did not carry their history on their face.

Janeta was about to close the heavy book, when on the last page she saw something which sentevery drop of blood from her heart and made her feel ready to faint.

It was the portrait of her husband—of the man who had deceived her, and whom she had foreaken—John Draw.

forsaken-John Drew.

At that very moment the lady of the house appeared.

(To be continued.)

LUIDUILTE'S LOVERS.

CHAPTER V .- (continued.)

"I have done nothing wrong," Luiduilte said at last, closing her lips in a firm line and lifting her head in the cold, haughty way which had earned for her the name of Anger had taken the place of her first feeling of contrition. What had she done to merit being spoken to in such terms? If her aunt had not been so cold and hard Llance would now be openly her affianced husband; and so she spoke coldly and clearly.

"Very well; you go out no more alone.
When is your next day for visiting these poor people?"
Luiduilte felt the eneer in her aunt's voice, and it goaded her to passionate anger.

"I will not tell you. I might lie, but I will not, and I refuse to be treated like a person of—"

"You are my ward, and I will do as I please.
When next you visit your pensioners I will accompany you," replied her aunt, sternly, and Luidnilte bowed, feeling too angry to speak aught but angry words, and not wishing to feel in the after time that she had been guilty of disrespect to one who had acted the part of a tender, loving mother to her.
"I shall not go to the opera to night," she

"I shall not go to the opera to night," she

"That is as you please, only as it is the young Count, François Rouget, who was to take us I regret your decision."

"Why ! because he was to take us? Burely

"Why! because he was to take us; nursey it will be easier to make your excuses to such an old friend," returned the girl, coldly. Luiduilte was learning the art of fencing, but it cost her much to appear so calm and self possessed.

"It is because he is such an old friend, or rather the son of such an old friend, that I am vexed, and," with a keen, significant glance, which it was useless to even pretend not to interpret, "because I wish you to stand well in his estimation."

Luiduilte did not immediately reply, but stood as though battling with herself, her gaze bent on the flowers at the window, which she saw not. A thousand expressions flitted across the dark, southern face, with its lines of Patrician beauty. And Mdlle. D'Almaine waited, gazing on the picture of loveliness her niece made as she stood there in the morning sunlight, then Luidvilte turned.

"Auntie, ma mignonne, ma petite mère, do not seek to ruin my life, our lives. You are mak-ing such a dreadful mistake." Her voice was thrilling with love and entreaty, her dusky eyes liquid with emotion, and the fair face had grown pale with emotion. The uplifted, clasped hands, the whole attitude of beseeching, moved the aunt's loving soul, but, she told herself, a good surgeon cuts deep in order to ensure a perfect cure.

Lianoe Grey was an utterly worthless soamp, and she must take strong measures, and at once, to keep him from her niece's society. So she hardened herself against the girl's piteous pleading, though she longed to take her in her arms, and soothe her with "No, Luiduite, it is you who are mistaken," she replied. "I cannot alter my decision. I have some letters of importance to write, and wish to be alone," and her niece went without

CHAPTER VI.

THE morning dawned fair and lovely; and as Luiduilte went to her window and drew aside the soft lace curtains, the first golden rays of the rising sun fell across the quiet rays of the rising sum and control of the sum as in London. The streets gradually became peopled, and the sounds of busy life in the air told that the city was awakening after its short sleep, and a half-fear crept into Luiduilte's heart as she thought of what this day was to be to her.

Liance had not made any appointment, any averangement, as to how they were to meet; but arrangement, as to how they were to meet; but she felt sure that he would make known to her the means during the morning, and she was

Mademoiselle, her aunt, was very silent, but not morose or stern, during breakfast. Once she broke it, looking up from the perusal of a

"You are looking pale, ma petite!" the old familiar term of endearment, which made the girl's heart leap, and a wild longing enter it to throw herself in those loved arms and confess

all. "Did you sleep well?"

"Very well, thank you, auntie!" In truth, she had scarcely closed her eyes.

After this there was silence again, which lasted until the meal was finished; then Mdlle. D'Almaine rose, gathering up her papers.
"I have a number of letters to write this morning," she said, pausing at the door of the small chintz-furnished breakfast-room. "You will, I daressy, find something to occupy yourself with until luncheon. There are those Chinese crnaments to look over and choose from;" and then she left the girl to her own

Not a word of reminder. No injunctions to said, quietly, and Mdlle. answered in the same | remain at home, only a quiet matter of course manner that, while it irritated, yet stung Luiduilte with remorse. Her aunt would never dream of such an act of disobedience as she was about to commit, and yet were there not extenuating circumstances?

But she was not long left to her self com-munings. As she crossed the room and looked out of the window she saw Colonel Dalziel pass along.

He did not pause, but as he neared their house he raised his eyes swiftly, then turned abruptly down a street nearly opposite, and Luiduilte's instinct told her that she must follow in his footsteps.

Going swiftly up to her room, she donned a soft blue cloak that revealed enough of the rounded figure to show its exquisite outlines, a bonnet with marabout feathers of the same hue, and parasol completed the toilette, which was charmingly simple and elegant.

Going down was the difficulty. She feared that on hearing her footsteps her aunt might come out to make some inquiry or remark and discover her in out-door attire!

But no such contretemps occurred, and in a few moments she was out in the street, where the bright sunlight falling on the pure white-ness of the stone houses made a blinding glare, which dazzled her for a few seconds; then with a boldness, born of desperation, she went swiftly across the broad road and disappeared round the corner of the street down which Colonel Dalziel had gone. As she had surmised he was waiting, and on he she had surmised he was waiting, and on beholding her came forward with unaffected eagerness, clasping the little trembling hand she held out in a close and protecting clasp. "I almost feared you would not understand. I saw you at the window, and so I risked it," he said quickly.

Luiduilte was silent—for a very good reason, she had nothing to say. A great weight of embarrassment fell upon her as she thought of what she was about to do, and, somehow, the Colonel's manner seemed to have a soupçon of flippancy in its tones.

Where is Lord Vermont?" she asked at last, feeling that she must speak.

They had been walking at least half-an-hour, and were nearing the barrier of the city, and Liance had not appeared.

"He is outside the barrier, as we deemed it safest for him not to be seen as yet in your company," returned the Colonel. Then added, company," returned the Colonel. Then added, with a slight bow, "You must excuse my making you walk, but you know it is against the laws of French propriety for a young lady to drive alone with anyone save her betrothed."

Luiduilte bowed in response. This, then, was what her aunt had meant about that drive

Her lovely face flushed hotly, and a heavy sense of shame weighed her down.

She never forgot that walk through the streets of Paris, though she never was quite sure in which direction she went; for her proud dark head, held always so calmly erect, was now drooped as though to hide it from the ace of passers-by.

A dark cloud seemed to be hovering over her, and a strange sense of shame pervaded her whole being. Luiduilte Dene would never become hardened in wrong doing.

On, on, her companion led her, out of the city now. They had resolved the barrier and passed through, the men staring in mute but not rude admiration at the beautiful southern face drooping like a fainting flower.

They smiled when the yellow-haired English-

They smiled when the yellow-haired Englishman sprang forward to greet them, and guessed part of their history. Would they have smiled could they have seen that lovely face as it look one short year after?

A carriage was in waiting, and soon they were whirling along the dry, dusty road.

Not a word was spoken after the first greetings until the carriage drew up before a small house nestling among climbers now in their first spring freshness. Here and there a French poplar reared its head, adding stiffness but not beauty to the scene. At the gate stood a man, with an uncluous smiling countenance, in the garb of a priest, who had emerged from the house on hearing wheels.

Ti

He opened the gate, speaking a few words in an city voice which struck unpleasantly even upon Luiduilte's ears, who was accustomed to the snavity of pricate. But there was no time to indulge in prejudices.

The father was leading the way to the house, and the girl followed, looking and feeling like one in a dream.

She took no notice of the house, which, at another time, would have charmed her, for Père Balzaine was a man of culture, and had gathered a pile of rarities from all nations, which were placed with taste in the several rooms through which they passed. But as they entered the apartment where the coremony was to take place she turned to Llance, her lovely opes filled with trouble and en-

"Oh, Llance!" she cried, "even now I shrink from this act. My sunt has been more than a mother to me, for she is the only relation I have, yet I have never wanted more. Will not my disobedience bring its own punishment?

"You have all a French girl's fear of your relatives, and I would not have urged you to this had I known of any other way of securing my darling for myself!" whispered Llance. "You will be mine for life now! Are you afraid? If so, I will wait,"

" No, Llance, I cannot risk being parted," she replied, seeing the hitter struggle her lover had within himself ere he could utter these words, and, woman-like, she forgot her own fears in witnessing his pain.

Then Lord Vermont turned to the pricet, who had retired to the far end of the room with the Colonel, and handing him a piece of paper said,-

It seemed to Luiduilte that she knelt for ages, while, after a few hurried words, the priest attered a slow, impressive benediction, and then bade her rise, saying,-

"May I be the first to congratulate your ladyship?"

The girl raised her eyes, a startled light leaping to them. Your dadychip! It had never occurred to her that the must take her husband's title. She was now Lady Vermont! Surely if her aunt sought a marriage of distinction for her she would deem an earl high enough in the social scale for her !

A few more hurried words, and then Lord Vermont turned to the girl he believed to be his wife, and led her out into the bright sun-

As he placed her in the carriage, under pretence of settling her cloak, he heat over her, and laid his first kiss on his wife's lips; and she blushing, yet with a brightness on her face, her whole, pure soul shining in the deep wells of her dark, passionate eyes, whispered,—

" Yours now, for life and all time!" Ah, Luiduilte, the day is not yet ended! Colonel Dalziel was in strangely gay spirits. He laughed, he jested, he told stories which made smiles and laughter ripple over face and lip of both listeners, Never deabting but that the ceremony just performed had been legal, they laughed gaily at his comic description of how Music. D'Almaine would receive the news. Now that it was all over, and shey were returning Luiduilte felt glad—nay, wildly joyone. Lisanocand she were man and wife, and noshing could separate them. They were going back to confess their fault, and seek the forgiveness which surely her aunt would accord when she found that they were matried fur-good and all.

People talk of presentiments, and of coming events easting their shadow before, yet the sunlight that lay acress the readway seemed to have orept also into Intiduitie's heart, and the scarlet hips were parted in a happy smile. Llance's face was transfigured, the yellow curis that clustered round the white brow seemed to have imprisoned the golden sunlight in their meshes, and his fear.

less, loving eyes were dark, like purple pansies with joy.

And Colonel Dalziel leant back against the soft cushions, amiling to himself as he thought ef the consternation a certain telegram which because of your links the practy. of the consternation a certain telegram which had come for Lord Verment that morning and which he had, unthinkingly, of course, thrown among his own papers—would cause. He had told his man to set these to rights, and bring any letters or telegrams round to Mdile. D'Almaine's at once, or perhaps, it would be better to meet them at the gates of

So it was, that when they alighted at the barrier they were met by a dapper little French valet, who handed Lord Vermont the telegram without any explanation.

Then a sudden pallor overspread the handsome face, and the brightness died out of it as he read the few words therein. "Anything wrong at home?" asked the Colonel, though he knew well already the contents.

Llauce looked up with a dazed expression,

Liance looked up with a dazed expression, and catching sight of Iniduilte's pallid, frightened face, gave a half-suppressed groom.

"Matter?" he said, hoarsely, yet quietly, "my sister is dying. I should have had this before breakfast. Luiduilte, I must go; you see that there is no time to lose. I may eatch the best even now; if not—"he could not finish. not flaish.

"You must go, of course," replied Lui-duilte, in the same calm tones, but with a world of auguish in hrr eyes. "What shall I tell my aunt, Llance?"

The power of strong self-repression in the girl's character came out in this hour of need. No nucleus olinging to her loving husband, no tears, only that quiet look of agony in the depths of her eyes, that ring of pain in the sweet, clear voice.

"Noshing, until I write or come. It can make no difference, and I would be with you. If possible, when the truth is told." Then he took her hand in his, holding it long and linguringly, gazing into the it long and lingeringly, gazing into the lovely face, so pale now, the while. He could not kiss those quivering lips, for they had left the carriage, and were amidst the bustling crowds of people passing to and fro. That one caress was all he would have to remember in the future.

"Good bye," he muttered huskily. "Heaven bless you, my, darling I" and then he hurried away leaving her standing by Colonel Daziel's side, dazed, and mable to move.

"He will just catch the boat?" observed
he, taking out his watch. "And now, miss—I beg pardon, Lady Vermont-I will escort you hou

"Miss Dene, if you please, until Llance claims me! You must not call me by that name, or you may forget in the presence of others," returned Luidnite, with a touch of weariness in her voice. Why was it that every-thing went wrong in herlife? When she thought she held the cup of happiness in her hands, and placed it near her lips, le! its contents proved to be a draught of bitter disappoint

"As you wish. Where you are concerned I have no desire. Your will is mine."

In her present state of mind, Luidnilto failed to discern the ring of passion in the cold, clear voice, and as they had arrived at the door of her home she paused, eaying,—

"Would you rather not come in?"
"Do you wish it?"
"To tell the truth, Colonel Dalaiel," replied Luiduille, with weary frankness, "Larve no knowledge of possessing any particular desires at the present moment. I am too bewildered by the events of the morning.'

"Not common once assuredly," he rejoined, hiding his chagrin at her natur absence of feeling for him. "You are to be pardonad. I will not trespass on your hespitality now. Goodday!" and lifting his hat he walked

Mille. D'Almaine was in her own room when her niece passed the door but she was because of you."

Iniduilte went into the pretty, tastefullyfurnished room, very much like her own, and crossing to the window paused at her aunt's side, standing unconsciously just where the sunlight fell full upon her. Mdile, looked up at her, wandering at her silence, and the sight of that levely white face, with its dark, sorrow-laden eyes, sent a thock of pain through her.

her.
"You wanted me, auntie. I am sorry!" she said, and the clear, sweet voice, once so blitbe and careless, sounded like the voice of one whem a sudden sorrow has fallen.

"Luiduilte, what ails you? You fright, me. You are like a ghost?" she cried out, risin hurriedly.

"I am well enough, auntic. I have walked too far, and am tired. I shall be myself again after a rest," she answered, trying to amile.

Ah, Luiduilte, you will never be your. self again. The past is gone and can never return. Only the curtained future is yours. That must come. What will it bring for Midle, forgot all about the letter she was writing, and hurriedoff to getsome restorative in the shape of a glass of wine, after which she ingisted on her niece's going to lie down in her room, a suggestion which Luiduilte was very room, a enggestion, which Luiduits was very glad to take advantage of. There was no engagement for that evening and their dinner was a very quiet affair, partaken of at eight o clock then affalle, seeing that the girl was really not well, sent her off to bed; where she toged restlessly to and fro until early morning. So ended Luiduitte's wedding-day!

CHAPTER VII.

THE days came and went, and no word from Llance; but Luiduilte would not allow herself to think this strange. How could be find sime to write with his sister sick unto death? Perhaps she was dead, and he was bowed under the weight of his sorrow. At this last thought a great pitiful longing to have him near her, to comfort him by the might of her own love, entered her soul, and the tears filled her lovely eyes. Poor Llance! how dreadful is lovely eyes. Poor would be for him!

Colonel Dalziel had called several times, and they knew that he also had received no message. He was waiting, he told them, for orders, as at present he knew not if his pupil would return to Paris or remain in England.

His perfect courtesy won both women's hearts, and Luidoltte grew to like him cordially for the atter absence of secreey in his dealings with her, even when speaking of Liance, for in Melle's, presence they did not mention his name often. Luiduilte's manner puzzled her aunt. There was no semblance of sorrow or pain; but a great change had come over her, a calm dignity, a quiet thoughfulness that made her more lovely than ever in the eyes of her numberless admirers.

But there came another change soon, which pained as well as puzzled Mdile. D'Almaine. One day, a manth after Liance's hurried departure, Colonel Dalsiel called upon her aunt, and though he was quiet and easy in his manner, Luiduits falt that there was mows; and when he asked permission to take her for a walk she gave her aunt no opportunisy for a "I will come with pleasure! I am shifling here indoors!" And Mille, was silent.

The Golonel, though she felt quits sure he loved her nices, was so much older and in every way not at all the kind of man who would attract her. So she settled it in her own mind, and had no fear that others might think differently.

differently.

The Colonel did not speak of Llance, even

l been

70 you adstill

efully. n, and auni's

re the sed up

d the dark.

rough

I" she blithe

alkad

yself

ng to your.

never

OBTS.

for WAR

ahe

her very en.

oner

ight

she

ornaelf

me

h er

is

ne

when he and his companion were far away from the house, among a crowd of people who would take no notice of them, save to request a passage with the customary pardonnez now and again, and Luiduilte waited for him to broach the subject. Then, finding that he did not apeak, she broke the silence which had fallen upon them.

"You have heard from Llance?" she asked,

in low, anxious tones.

I have, and it was to tell you so that I asked you to accompany me in my evening stroll; and now you are here I dare scarcely tell the contents of Lord Vermont's letter!" He spoke in a grave, carnest manner, with a tinge of pain in his voice that startled Lui-

"His sister is dead, and he cannot comeyet," responded the girl, sadly. I deared it when he went. Poor Liance!"
They had walked on some distance from their house, and were near the Jardin Desi Plantes, and the Colonel led her to one of the most sequestored seats, begging her in suppli-cating tones to be calm, and of course arousing all the quick, impatient fear of her passion-ing at the quies, impasses each of the passions ate nature.

"No, his eister is better. It is not that. Oh, Mdlla, Dene, can you not guess? See, I call you Dene, and we are alone. Do you not guess now?" he exclaimed, hurriedly.

"I do not understand you," the said quietly, had lies white as the flant delies near the seet.

her lips white as the fleur-de-lis near the seat. "But you frighten me with that wild manner of yours. Tell me, what is it that has happened?"

"Something far worse than death. I will read you his letter." There was a solemnity in his tones that struck terror to Luiduilte's heart, and bending her proud dark head she heart, and bending her productions asked pitconally,— asked pitconally,—

"Has he not written to me?"
"No. Here is my letter."
Colonel Dalziel drew a bulky envelope from an inner pocket, and extracting the contents with a cold deliberation that made all the girl's light manual payer noise. looked down the highly-wrought nerves quiver, looked down the pages of the epiatle; then glancing up with a pitying smile he observed,—

"I would scarcely dare read such words, only they are a message. Of course the letter commences as all others; then—'My sister is better, much better, and I have decided on re-maining in England. The mater does not re-lish the idea of losing sight of me again, especially as a pet hobby of hers might be sent to the winds by my so doing. New for the hobby! It is no other than that I should wed a young lady whose estates adjoin mine!"

Luiduilte, sitting under the shade of the trees with white, set face, and closed lips, through which the warm breath source seemed to pass, did not see the lines after—these last words which the Colonel omitted. She only heard those that followed, and the calm and peace of her young life died out under their influence

"The inea meets with my utenust approval, as you may guess, and it only remains for you to make things all right with Luiduite. Explain to her the informality in our marriage, and assure her that I did not mean it at the time, but that now it teems Providence has worked all things for the best. I hope the marriage will take place before Christmas, and I can imagine the enlogiams on the bride's beauty. Give my warment regards to Mdlle. D'Almaine......"

"Shall I read on?" arked the Colonet, pausing. "There is nothing more about yourself, only instructions for my return to England, and the setting of some wills, 45."
"You have read all that concerns me!"

returned Luiduite, lifting her eyes, black with passionate sorrow, to his face and emiling —yes, smiling quietly—"I will return home, if you do not mind, and write to Lord Vermont," It would be a pity to keep him in suspense when he is so anxious for the welding to take place in the autumn," she added, will with that old, froza smile on the perfect lips, a smile sadder for than all tears, that did not wioked heart gave a sudden bound.

"Of you I shall ever 'think as of one who tried all in his power to promote my happiness," she cried passionately. "That you failed is no fault of yours; and tell me, is it really true beyond a doubt that our marriage was not legal? I am half-bewildered, and take things too much for granted."

"Unhappily, it is a fact. One great thing is that you are a Roman Catholic, and Llance is a Protestant, and there was only a Remish priest present at the ceremony. Then there are other informalities. If inquired into all this before delivering Lord Vermont's letter, which I remixed yesterday.

"Do not say unhappily. It is better so, since he wishes it," rejoined Luiduike. "Now I am quite sure that there is no mistake I can write to him. I wilt give it into your charge when finished if you have no objection."

"I shall be only too happy to do anything to assist you, Midle, Done," he answered; and then they passed out of the garden, and pursued their way towards the home where Islance had come to Luiduilte in the gloam-

ing.
At Luidnilte's request the Colonel went op with her when they reached the bonse. She did not feel equal at present even to sustain a conversation with her aunt, and ex-cused herself before he took his departure, much to Mdlle.'s surprise. Greatly to his surprise, as Colonel Daiziet passed down the stairs after bidding good day to Mille. D'Al-maine, Luidulte appeared before him, her large eyes aglow with passionate anger, making the calm pale face terrible in its

"You did not tell me. I did not under-stand. Did Llance say he was unaware of the illegality of our marriage?" she asked, in a

"He says so, but he knew from the first.

Pere Balzaine told me when I persisted in questioning him. Shall I come to morrow for your letter?"

She bowed her head, and stood saide for him to pass.

The Colonel's tact was perfect, and he know that in her first agony it were beet not to say more than was absolutely necessary. Her pride would rise paramount, and then he would speak! And Luiduilte west back to her room, and seated herself at her haudsome writing desk. Bat words did not come as easily as she had felt they would. She dipped the pen in the ink, wrote her address and the two words "Lord Vermont," and could go no farther. What could she say? It must be in the fewest words she sent him her farewell, and in such wise as to show no sign of this burning pain has head this terrible theat saidness as the sent him her farewell, and in such wise as to show no sign of this burning pain has head this terrible theat saidness as the sent saidness as t in her head, this terrible heart-sickness that seems to have taken all the beauty, youth, and freshness out of her life.

An hour passed, and the paper remained un-marked; then suddenly she bent forward, and market; then suddenly she bent torward, and the pen flew swifely over the page for a few moments. When she paned it was to lay her beautiful dark head down on the paper and sob as those sob whose hearts are broken.
By and by she took up the letter, and scanned it ever with a strange mixture of leve and scorn in her passionate eyes. It ran thus:

"Lond Vermonr,-My lord, Colonel Dalziel has given me your message, and while appre-viating the delicate regrets expressed in your letter. I beg to state that the discovery of the informality in that abourd ceremony has afforded me much pleasure. I shall shortly return to where scarcely any would think of going by reason of the tall shrub that appeared to bar bours, and hope to make your mother's acquaintance, and perhaps that of your wife on the lovely face, a little weary, now that pain of the dusky eyes.

"Mille,," exclaimed Colonel Dalziel, "I no cause for future trouble of the dusky eyes.

"Mille,," exclaimed Colonel Dalziel, "I no cause for future trouble of the dusky own will ever regard me as a kind of remain, yours in haste, "Ludullte Dene."

Ludullte turned to him, her eyes shiring with a quick glow of gratifude; and his guilty, was a quick glow of gratifude; and his guilty, was radiantly lovely, bright laughter tippled over her rich red lips, and not a trace of our pain was on the rare, sweet face; but the pain was on the rare, sweet face; but the eyes, and told himself that he would do well to strike while the iron was hot!

CHAPTER VIII.

The days passed swifely by. A week had down since Luxurite sat on that seat in the Jardin Des Plantes, and heard her door. There was a grand performance at the Thick re-Français, and Inideitte and her sans, ac-companied by Colonel Dalziel, were there. On the entrance of this small party a hundred lorgastes went up, and soon their number was doubled three fold. No reason now to complain of coldness. Where Luidailte before had driven men mad by her hautear and indifference, the now faccinated and embrelled them by her vivacity and wit, the brilliancy of her smiles, and the softness of her laugh, that had in it a ring of sercasm, and the great dark eyes, with that luminous, passionate defi-ance in their depths. The beauty had awakened to a knowledge of her power, they said among themselves, and was more love inspiring than ever.

And Inidnilte never once thought of her And Luidulte never once thought of fer rare beauty. The homege of these men dit not give her the pleasure they thought it did, for, in her gratification, there was a spice of cruelty. She would draw men thus to worship at her shrine; when in England Lianos should see that what he threw away was fought for by others. Poor Frenchmen, keep your hearts safe. She is only practising on you in order to gall the heart of one Englishman.

Luiduilte never refused invitation to ball, opera, or conversazione now; and after the opera, there was an engagement for a ball at the Duchess of 8-

The young Count, François Rouget, was there; and though fascinated with the rest by the wenderful, radiant beauty, her manner caused him some uneasiness.

To his keen eyes there was a restlessness in her vivacity, a cynicism in her repartee; and when she spoke with a smile on her lips, her eyes were heavy with pain. He knew that Lord Vermont had been called suddenly home, and he knew no more. Had this golden baired Englishman, with the face of a god, played her false? At this thought, the Frenchman's inborn love of duelhing showed itself, and Franguis Rouget told bimself that he would willingly fall in averging a light to Initalite. He was wise, and tidnot speak his thoughts to her. One thing puzzled him, and that was the constant attendanceof the Colonel.

He had an instinctive dislike of the mar, though he could not put it into words: and even if he had he could not go to Luiduitte

Dene and say,-

"Do not trust that man, because I dislike and fear him.'

She would laugh in his face.
What would then have been his feelings could be have followed the Colonel and Luidulle as, after a well z to the levely marie of "Welt Von dir," he led her to a conservasory to rest ?

The music came to them in low, murmurous tones, and the air, rich with perfume, was filled with the sound of hidden fountains.

Colonel Dalziel had led Luidnilte to a sent there was no one to make observations on her

"Miss Dene," he said, at length, breaking the silence suddenly; and she looked up into the keen eyes, and saw there what made her droop her own in swift amazement. "Miss Dene, Luiduilte, I have loved you since that first evening in ____, when I saw you stand-ing under the acacias, with the sunset lights about your head—loved you wildly, passionately, as men do who at my age can say women's looks have been nought to me hitherto save as a pastime, a—"

"You love me!" cried the girl, unable to control her astonishment. "You loved me when you sought to wed me to another!"

"I loved and love you!" he returned, vehemently. "But never did I intend you to learn my secret. Now it is different. I am not showing any dishonour in declaring my passion, and I ask only a little love from the passion, and I ask only a little love from the woman who has all my own!" Luiduilte sat perfectly still, her great dark eyes looking into space, and reflecting the thoughts that passed swiftly through her busy brain. The strength and purity of the man's love, as represented by himself, touched her.

He had striven all in his power to win happiness for her, and when the man who had pro-fessed to love her deserted and left her an object for pity, and perhaps ridicule, he came and offered her his honest, true love.

Luiduilte Dene was not like some women, who would have sunk under the bitterness of the blow she had received. Nothing could ever kill her love; but a strong armour of pride and passionate, sorrowful anguish kept guard over it, and she told herself that it would be as well to return to England an affisneed, if not wedded, bride.

Why should she not reward Colonel Dalziel's love? She could never again care for one man more than for another, and he did not expect her to give him love for love, and—Yes, this thought had greater influence than all. Llance would see that he had not broken her heart, that life still had joys for her. would not have the power, then, to tell himself that she sorrowed for him!

"I never thought of this, Colonel," she said, at last, looking up into his face. "But if you "But it you can be content after-

He did not give her time to conclude, but bent over her, pressing his lips to her cold brow, and murmuring incoherent words of love and thanks.

His passion and fervour startled the girl into a remembrance of what she had done; but she had put her hand to the plough, and would go through with it now. After all, life was not so very long, and then there would come eternal peace!

She rose with the calm on her face that this thought brought, and asked him to lead her back to the ball-room.

François Rouget was the first person they encountered, and a sickening dread took possession of his soul when he saw the look of triumphant joy on the Colonel's usually stern face, the fierce delight in the keen grey eyes. Though he was virtually alone with Luiduilte several times after that he dared not speak, for of late there had sprung up a coolness between the friends, though François did not know why.

Luiduilte had first been vexed when he had spoken again of Lord Vermont's attentions and peculiar behaviour in not asking her hand openly; but now there was a proud fear that he would discover how right he had been, and she kept aloof as much as possible. All this of course, was unknown to the young Count, but he felt the influence of it, and dared not speak.

That night, when Luiduilte and her aunt arrived home, as they stood in the room where Liance had whispered his love, Luiduitte told of her engagement to Colonel Dalziel. And Mölle, D'Almaine, looking at the tall, erect figure in old gold velvet and pearls, looking at the cold pallor of the lovely face, and the burning lustre of the wondrous eyes, felt that this was not her nicce's choice, not her heart-

"Why not the Count?" she asked quietly.
"I should grow to hate him. Colonel Dalziel I shall tolerate," was the calm reply. She would not even protend love to her aunt; but Mdlle. somehow felt that Luiduilte's decision was final, and she sighed deeply. Once ahe had hoped to see her niece a French Countess; then had come the idea of a more buillion. brilliant marriage; now she would be only Mrs. Dalziel; and yet, if it had been for her happiness, she would have been content.

CHAPTER IX.

Dene Hall was a fine old house, nestling among great trees that had stood round it, proudly defying the wind and storm for many —many centuries. Built of greystone, with terraces running north and south, a smooth stretch of grasaland facing the West, where stately peacocks strutted, and a broad carriage drive on the southern side, a drive that ended in a magnificent avenue, no wonder Luiduilte's in a magnificent avenue, no wonder Luiduite's proud heart leaped with pleasure as she drove up to the house, bathed now in deep amber and purple lights thrown by the setting sun. There was that peculiar hush in the air that seems to come ever at this time of year in the country, and the grand old trees were attired in their richest garb of crimson, gold, and reast brown. and russet brown.

Colonel Dalziel, seated on the opposite sea in the landau gazed passionately at the lovely face, flushing and paling with emotion. In the distance, standing out from the haze, rose the quaint towers of Lord Vermont's home, and Luiduilte's eyes had grown dim with pain as her aunt pointed it out. To Colonel Dalziel's ner aunt pointed it out. To Colonel Dalziel's heart there came a great fear that he might lose his prize yet, after all his cruel scheming—after bartering away his very soul.

"A grand old place!" he remarked, letting his gaze fall on those distant towers, purpled by the sunset, and Luiduilte lifted her head proudly, saying.—

"Yes, and worthy a noble master." Colonel Dalziel heard the soorn in the rioh young voice, saw the haughty glow in the dusky eyes, and felt that he was safe. Mdlle. D'Almaine smiled as she observed,-

"Its master is worthy, if all I hear of him be true. He is said to be indefatigable in his endeavours to render his people happy!"

"No doubt, auntie; he was very pleasant to us. I liked him greatly," returned the girl; and then the door was thrown open, and disand then the door was thrown open, and dis-closed a long line of servants waiting in the hall to welcome the mistress, who had for-bidden any rejoicings on her home-coming. They had wondered a little what kind of girl she would be, and some had hinted that she must be one of the haughty imperious class of secure, but when the stanged out of the must be one or the haughty imperious class of women; but when she stepped out of the carriage, and passed up the steps into the large hall, her face lit by one of her rare sweet, smiles, while the rich voice spoke some gracious words of greeting, the verdict was unanimous, that their young mistress was truly one of the "old stock." The first days of her return were spent in looking over accounts with the steward, and planning improvements in the cottages belonging to the Dene Estate. Many things were to be done, she found, on going round amongst her people, and during these visits she made herself acquainted with these visits she made herself acquainted with their little grievances in such a manner as completely won all hearts. The home-com-ing of the heiress was a blessing to her tenants, they all agreed. Colonel Dalzie', as her affianced husband, entered into all her plans, winning more of her esteem than she had ever expected to bestow.

These were haloyon days for him—days there-membered bliss of which was in the after-time like so much soalding water upon an open wound. Ah, surely it is not well to work such

(To be continued.)

A DAY IN SPRING.

No more my heart is sad, For all the world is glad; Life seems a joyous thing, On this fair day of spring.

Again is faith alive, My dead desires revive, And old hopes bud anew, Beneath this sky so blue.

My doubts and fears are stilled, My soul with peace is filled, And nature's tender voice Bids me anew "Rejoice!"

The clear air golden gleams,
As sunlight through it streams; The hills and valleys ring,
While birds their anthems sing.

The brooklet sparkling shows, As calmly on it flows, A silver thread between The meadows' tender green.

In happy, joyous mood, I say that "God is good," Because, in freshness clad, The world is gay and glad.

But, when dark clouds appear, And all grows dark and drear, Shall I again distrust And bow me in the dust?

Ab, that I cannot tell! He doeth all things well," And I am slow to learn The lesson somewhat stern.

Yet I to-day can raise My voice in heart-felt praise; For sights and sounds are fair On this spring day so rare !

J. L.

ROY'S INHERITANCE.

-:0:--

CHAPTER XIX.

"HAVE you heard?" asked the Duchess, excitedly, as she came into the morning room where Mr. Fred Sinolair had been breakfast ing with Lady Alice Hawkshaw, "Some horrible tragedy has happened at Mount-falcon!" falcon !

"Not to the fairy princess!" exclaimed Fred, in dismay, as he sprang from his seat. "Not to the poor old man!" from Lady Alice, whose sympathy was ready for any-one but the girl whom she thought was a

"Nobody knows exactly!" lowering her voice, mysteriously. "Some say it was burglars, others that Philip Falconer was mixed up in it, but that's too horrible."
"Might I be allowed to have the dog oart?"
put in Sinclair, eagerly. "I must go over there at once.

"You must do nothing of the kind! You would ruin everything. Didn't I tell you that Philip Falconer was there?"

"All the more necessary for me to be on the spot," looking as if he were on the point of starting.
"Sit down and listen to me."

"For five minutes, and then I must go off.
Might I go so far as to ring the bell?"
"No, we have no orders to give, and I don't

"No, we have no orders so give, and I don't want to be interrupted."

"Must I drag myself there, all those miles on foot?" with his eyebrows halfway up his forehead. "I shall faint on the doorstep, and the princess will have to take me in, and nurse me!"

"I think she has taken you in already!"
laughed Lady Alice. "But now," turning to her sister, " pray don't attend to Mr. Sinclair any more. I want to hear if anybody is dead any more. or dying I"

"The old man's very bad," said the Duchess, solemnly, "and I consider it heart-less to laugh. A shot in the chest is no joke at seventy or eighty!"
"A shot!" the others exclaimed simul-

"A shot!" the others exclaimed simultaneously, with an equal amount of dismay.
"Yes, a shot. It is said to be an accident; but I know somebody who calls it by an uglier name," with a significant glance.
"Where's the somebody?" oried Fred.
"Introduce me at once! I'll worm the truth out of him before you're an hour older."

"This is all I know," said the Duchess, taking no notice of his interruption. "At about one o'clock there was a noise in the house, and your friend," nodding to Fred, then the house was a house of the house, and your friend," nodding to Fred, then the house was a discovered basel. "and Philip Falconer were discovered kneel-ing by the side of Lord Mountfalcon's body, which looked just like a corpse!"

"How extraordinary! But where was the man who waits on him?"
"That's the odd thing, Alice. He was alone with these two in an upper part of the

"My theory is this," said Fred, gloomily.
"Those two were having a regular spoon, and Mr. Falconer shot his father, taking him for an ediously inconvenient burglar. It makes me sick to think of that adorable little thing "Do you think he will die?" asked Lady Alice in an awestruck tone.
"It is were anyone else I should think he certainly would; but nothing kills a miser, when his money would do so much good to when his money would do so much good to somebody who can scarcely live without it."

"Ah! poor Roy, if he had been there this would never have happened. I wonder if he will hear of it?"

"I shall send for him," said the Duchess, promptly. "There's not a doubt that he ought to be on the spot."

"Oh, hang it all!" exclaimed Fred, "between the two how is a fellow to get a chance?"

"He won't put his foot inside Mountfalcon, so you needn't be afraid."
"But I am afraid! Oh, dear Duchess!
Let me have a horse, and I'll ride over this afternoon and see if I can't catch a glimpse of her. She would be more likely to come out then than in the morning, and just see what a lot I could tell you when I came back!"

Perhaps on account of this artful suggestion the Duohess at last consented, but gave him the Duchess at last consented, but gave him express orders to do nothing compromising, and on no account to lose the key of the postern, as she had procured it with great difficulty.

"I don't think you are wise to trust that mad boy !" and Lady Alice shook her pretty head, as soon as he had left the room. "He will be getting himself into some awful scrape, and you too."
"I don't think so. He's wide-awake, and I must know."

Lady Alice looked at her sister curiously, and wondered why she took such a vivid interest in Mountfalcon, and everything to do

The Duchess had a craving to be alone, and went away to her boudoir, where she paced up and down, with pale lips, tightly pressed together, and drawn brows.

Oh! if Lord Mountfalcon were going to die. Why didn't he die before, when happiness was still possible, and hope not dead? If Roy had come to her with Mountfalcon at his back, how joyfully she would have flown to his arms. his arms !

A cursed prudence had taken possession of her then for the only time in her life. She thought of ways and means, of poverty, with all its mean and shabby concomitants—poor makeshifts in the way of dress, unestable dinners in cheap lodgings, no society but the wives of her husband's brother officers—and came to the conclusion that she could not face it; and now she had everything she wantan in Blankshire.

Oh! how willingly she would give up all that she had prized too dearly if she could only be Marion Hawkshaw once again, with Roy for her devoted lover!

for her devoted lover!

"Roy! Roy!" she gasped, with hands pressed tightly against her chest, as if she hoped that her voice could reach him, though she knew him to be miles away.

Would this longing never die? Would this thirst for a look or a word never be quenched? Must she go on for ever till the day of her death thinking of what might have been, regretting what could never be undone? No. no, no! Her health was splendid. She might live fifty years longer, and fifty years of misery would be certain to turn her brain. She must cure herself, it was absolutely ne-

She went and stood by her husband's sofa, but there seemed to be no cure for her diseased mind in the contemplation of his helpless

A little while ago that very helplessness had touched her deeply, but now her heart felt

The Dake was dozing, but sleep could lend no beauty to his rugged features. His wife shuddered, for his ugliness had never struck her so forcibly before. She mentally compared him with Roy Falconer—one of the hand-somest men in the cavalry—and one evil thought after another glided like a poisonous r into her brain.

Any other man would have died after that terrible accident on the ice. Could this half inanimate existence be called life? He was no good now to himself or to anyone else. Surely there ought to be a law to allow helpless crea-

It might be done quite painlessly. She had heard of people passing away into another world because of having slept in an ill-ventilated room, where the fire was made of char-coal. She had heard of others dying of some subtle poison, without an ache or a pang—a poison which left no trace behind, but yet stole poison which left no trace behind, but yet so into the springs of life and dried them up.

Would not that poor, helpless log be far better off in the land of shadows than here, tied to a sofs, playing dominoes like a brain-less child, his intellect dead, his strength gone, no joy to himself, a sorrow or a disgust to everyone else?

She stood there like a Medusa, her eyes fixed on the unconscious face with a fierce, unholy light under their dark lashes.

Her innermost soul revolted at the thought of being tied to a man who was nothing but a lump of flesh and bone, who had sunk to the

She, the beauty of Mayfair—the belie of the New Club balls, the cynosure of all eyes in the Row, the feted, courted, Marion Hawkshaw-was she to be condemned for ever by a marriage that was no marriage in anything but name? How could she love, honour, and ey a creature who could neither excite affection nor respect, nor give a single order?
Why was her fate to be harder than that of any other married woman in the world?

"Away with your row hate any other married woman in the world?

any other married woman in the world?
"Away with you, you hate me, you want to kill me!" cried her husband, waking from his sleep, and he tried to push her from him wish his poor, powerless hands.
She stepped back with a shudder. Why did he think that she wanted to kill him?
Had he read the thought in her mind? Had he guessed by a subtle instinct that she had long to be delivered from the burden of his wreaked life?

ked life? Martin hurried in from the adjoining room at the sound of his master's voice, and the Duchess slunk away like a guilty criminal from the eye of a detective. The poor Duke of Honiton kept jabbering some offensive epithets, whilst he pointed his finger in scorn at his wife's receding figure. It was curious that ever since his illness he had turned against his wife, calling her by the vilest names whenever she came near him. hand.

wanted, and she was the most miserable He seemed to have a perverse and rooted idea that she was treating him shamefully now that be could no longer defend himself. Martin had done his best to reason him cut of it, but his master was as much beyond the reach of reason as a baby in arms was behind it. Persuasion had no effect on bim, and the only way to stop his tongue and soothe his excitement was to attract his attention to some other subject. This Martin attempted to do, but at first without success. It was just as if some slanderous tale had been breathed into the Duke's ears during his sleep, for he spoke with conviction as well as with the bitterest anger.

"She has deceived me!—turn her out!—she's not fit to live under this roof! Wretched woman, go and hide your face I"

Lady Alice was just going in to pay her morning visit to her brother in law when the Dachess, who was still standing cutside the door, stopped her.

"Listen!" she said, in a hoarse whisper. "Isn't that a delightful sort of husband to be blessed with? Could he say worse of me if I were the vilest creature on earth? Isn't it enough to tempt a woman to break out?"
"It's very hard to bear," taking hold of her

"It's very hard to bear," taking hold of her sister's hand and pressing it tight. "Hard! It's impossible," with a quick-drawn breath. "I ought to be able to get a divorce from a husband who is no more good divorce from a husband who is no more good to me than a doll."

"Ob, don't say that!" and Lady Alice looked pained. "Divorce is never right. But don't be in despair, darling. It won't go on much longer, and if it does, ask Heaven to help you to bear it."

"Oh, it's easy to talk!" and the Duchess wrenched away her hand impositently.

wrenched away her hand impatiently.
"You've got the whole world before you.
You can choose which road you like, but mine is blocked for ever,"

She turned away, and walking quickly down the corridor, disappeared in the direction of her own suite of rooms.

The powers of good and evil were struggling that day for the possession of her storm-tossed soul. She asked herself fiercely why she should be better than anyone else? She did not mean to do anything wrong, so where was the harm of asking Roy Falconer down, that she might look upon his handsome face, and hear his deep-toned voice? She would not utter a word that the whole world might not hear; she would act as if her husband were by her side with all his powers of mind as keen as ever; but she had a longing to see the face of an old friend, and nothing else would satisfy her.

She was too weak to stand against this temptation—when he was far away from sight or hearing; but she was perfectly certain she could stand firm, with the proper dignity of a wife, in spite of old association togging at her heart strings, and the thought of sweet bygone hours! So she listened to the wiles of the Tempter, and telling herself that she was of a stronger mould than most of her sex, wrote the letter which was a proof of her womanly weakness

" No, nothing shall ever induce me to stay twenty-four hours at the Castle!" exclaimed Roy, as the letter slipped from his fingers on to the hearthrug. "I'll go down to the Claverings and run over there, perhaps just to find out what I can about my grandfather.
But," and he shook his well-shaped head with the determination of a Wellington, and something like a vow that he would never be the Duchess's frierd.

CHAPTER XX.

PHILIP FALCONER'S brain was actively engaged in developing plans for the future. He had not slept a wink, his thoughts being divided between the golden hoard in the empty bed-room on the same floor as himself, and the father who had so nearly died by his

He knew that he had thrown away his last chance of a reconciliation with the father thers-fore he must seek for a fortune in any other place than his will,

He had introduced Nora Macdonald into the house, he had constituted himself her only friend, whether she accepted him as such of not, and it seemed to him the most natural thing that she should pass on to him all that she acquired through his instrumentality.

This could be only done in one way. It was folly to think that she would give her wealth to anyone but the man whom she had chosen for ber husband.

Her affections must therefore be diverted from Roy, to Pnilip Falconer, and it did not strike him that this was too hard a thing for him to accomplish.

Many women had loved him; why should this girl be more difficult to please than the rest ?

He reasoned like a man of the world, know ing very little of hearts as pure and loyal as Nora Macdonald's. With her, to love once was to love for ever, and whether she died in the heyday of youth or the twilight of old age, she was sure to carry that love with her to her

"You can't conceive how many enemies I have in the world," he said as he was folding up a cigarette after they had breakfasted to gether in the library. "Anyone else but you gether in the library. "Anyone else but you would have misjudged my motive last night. My father has a very dangerous habit of walk ing in his elcep, and, when I am here, I always sit up till the small hours to see that he doesn't come to grief."

"But, surely, that is Venables business!" and Nora locked up into his face with grave

Venubles does not undertake to watch both night and day. It would require a man of

"I could scarcely believe my own eyes when I saw Lord Mountfalcon pass my door. It seemed so strange that he could walk upstairs when he was supposed to be ill in bed ! Pailip frowned

"Why weren't you in bed yourself?"
"It was such a luxury to have a fire once again that I sat up to enjoy it," with a smile.

" I wish to heavens I had never ordered 54.93

But why, Mr. Falconer? I thought you found me rather useful," she said, in surprise. " I shall always be associated in your mind with that horrid eight!"

What does that matter? A son's place is by his father's side in danger. I forgot, though!" with reddening cheeks, " there was no dauger till you brought the pistol!"
"What do you mean?" he said, fleroely, his face growing deathly white.

"I mean that there was no pistel in Lord Mountfalcon's band," she said, bravely, though her heart beat fast.

Might I atk, Miss Macdonald, what you are meaning to insinuate by that remark? he asked, slowly, a sneer upon his livid lips; but his cold, grey eyes fixed on the family portrait beyond her young head.

" Nothing-nothing at all I" hastily.

"It was not a sensible remark-for there are other things besides bands-a pocket, for instance, which contained the key of a door as well as that of an iron cheet; besides the re volver! Answer me, and tell me the truth?" making an effort, and raising his eyes to the girl's resolute face, "Do you accuse me of wishing to marder my father?

" No, no !" stepping back in horror. " No one but a fiend would do that."

Then, had as I am, I'm not exactly a fiend ? earth thinks of me; but that you should misjadge me is more than I can pear !" his voice softened to its most pathetic key.

Bat I don't, indeed—indeed, I don't? filled with remotee for even her passing thoughts.

What should I gain by it?" he went on, with an air of injured innocence, "I know for a certainty that I'm struck, out of my father's will, therefore his death would rob me of my last hope. I don't complain of his harshness. I have my enemies, and he believes what they say. It is a fearful shame; but I say nothing."

But he never sees anyone," she began

"He did not always live like this. Do you know what drove him to it? Disappointment in his grandson."

Nora started, and the indignant blood rushed her cheeks. "I don't believe one word of ist

"You are too polite," with a mock, how "I ought to have taken more care when I was talking to Roy's self-elected champion."

"I don't obcose to listen when people are being abused behind their backs!" she said as loftily as she could, in spite of a vivid blash.

"The facts speak for themselves. Ray was his grandfather's Banjamin ones; now be has changed positions with Ishmael. Whose fault is that?

"Not his own-I'm as sure as I can be. "All right; be sure, poor little thing! all right; be sure, poor little ining! The disillusion will come soon enough," and with a smile that angered her as much as if he had doubled his fist and struck her be stepped out of the window to enjoy his

His grandfather's Benjamin once I touching it sounded! She could fancy Captain Falconer as a light-hearted, happy boy, bringing life and happiness to the old weird house, and scattering its gloom and darkness with abouts of boyish laughter.

It Philip Falconer had caused him to be sent away, and banished for ever from his own home, he certainly had gaired nothing by his baseness; for he was in no better favour than his nephew.

She puzzled over these things, as she sat by the old Viscount's bedside. He seemed to be pleased to have her with him; but he carcely spoke a word, and when she read out The Times in her soft, clear voice, he promptly fell into a

Philip did not come near him, and as he had cautioned her not to mention his name, she felt sure that he was staying on against his father's wishes.

Still it was no affair of hers, and it seemed only right and proper that his son should be on the spot when Lord Mountfalcon was so ill. No doctor was sent for, although the extraction of the bullet by unskilful hands would have been likely to cause the patient's death. Why was it that no one, not even a physician or surgeon, was allowed to enter that sterious house?

Falconer was grave and preoconpied, but he laid himself out to please Nora-Macdonald. Noticing that she looked pale at Inncheen, he delighted har by proposing to take her for a

"Grissla would carry you beautifully, and it would do you all the good in the world i" He pook poohed all her objections, and ahe flow upstairs like a bird. In her cagerness for the exercise she liked best all her tragic ideas had passed away, and phe was almost pro-pared to swear that Mr. Philip Falconer, was a good natured man, who would not hurt a

When she came down in her neat dark blue habit, which fitted her rounded figure to per feation, he did not say much, but his eyes absolutely devoured her. The mere sight of her sweet eager face, wish the flush of excite-ment on her delicate checks, made the blood

He helped her, on to the pretty bay mare, and arranged her habit with a lingering touch. Then he mounted his own black horse, and they rodeoff across the wide stretch of grass at s gentle canter, which quickened presently into a hand gallop, the bay mare being fresh, and Norw not quite cap ble of holding her in, How the girl enjoyed it in every fixe of her

Philip was delighted, for he knew that he had gained ground enormously since the be-ginning of the day; and as his own admiration increased, he grew intexicated with the thought of his approaching success.

It would be something to boast of it he could tame the child's proud spirit, and claim all her sweetness and beauty for his own. For that she was beautiful, be frankly so keeping now—as beautiful as Lady Marion, Hawkshew was when she turned from the unclass readily as soon as the nephew appeared in the door-

He could not forget Nora as she appeared to him like an angel of light, croing to his help in the middle of the night, her glarions hair hanging in heavy; golden masses over her aboulders, her large eyes wide open with horrer and wender; and yet how helpful and brave she was in spite of her fear? She had conquered him then completely, and he resolved to win her—not only, because also would bring the much needed griet to his mill, but because he felt maddened by the charm of but because he felt maddened by the charm of her beanty.

Meanwhile, Mr. Fred Sinclair had started on his self-chosen mission.

His volatile young heart was beating fast with hope and expectation as he tied his horse to the thorn tree, pulled the key, which the Duchess had obtained through bilesry and corruption, out of his pocket, opened the postern-gate, and stood once more, under the oh trees of Mountfalos

How beautiful the park looked in the bright annahine! The soft brown of the withered bracken, the bright green of the righ gress, the deer browning quietly on the righ grans, the lifting autlered heads at the sound of approach-ing houfe!

Fred Sinclair hurried to an opening in the trees, for he heard them, too; and presently he saw Nora riding on Grissles, with a man whom he recognised intuitively, and hated on jesiousy, and plunged on through the under-wood, reakless of consequences, if only he could eatch sight, once again, of the fairy

By making great haste, he thought, he could meet them once again, for they were, making as wide a round as they could, and he was bent on cutting a corner.

He went on without once looking over his shoulder, entirely engrossed in the ferent desire to catch another glimpes, of the face that haunted his dreams; and, forgatting that at any moment, he was liable to being taken up for trespassing. He took no precautions, but dashed through the sea of bracken heldly as if he had been one of Lord Mountfalon's most favoured guests, while a man in a suit of h steen, with leather gaiters, watched him with amazement.

His first thought was that the strang a poscher, but when he saw that he had nothing in his hand but a stick on a riding crop, he came to the conclusion that he was a lunatio, and gave chase at once, crashing through the ferns with the weight of a bullock.

Fred Sinclair heard the noise behind him,

Fred Sinclair heard the noise behind him, but did not stop until a surly voice called out...
"Hullon, you shere! I'll trouble you to stop. You've no business in them covers!!"
Fred felt a pang of dismay, but, treasd round with a seemingly undanated front.
"At last I've found a human being in this descrited place!" he said, as soolly as he could considering that his breath, was, rather exhausted by his run. "The Countess, of Clavering's compliments, and how is Lord Mountfalcon?"

The gamekeeper, Robert Davis, stood still and rubbed his chin.

"It wasn't after his lordship's 'esith you were pounding along at that page. There's the 'ouse; why the d—L didn't you go up. to the front door if you were to mighty anxious 2."

Fred was not to be nonplussed like any ordinary mortal.

"If you wish to know," he said, haughtily. "I saw Mr. Falconer in the distance, and I wished to catch him up."

wished to catch him up."

"That sounds fair enough," said Davis, elowly. "Just you come along with me, and I'll take you to Mr. Philip."

"Not at all," hastily. "You can tell ros as well as anyone how Lord Mountainer is."
Davis shook his head.

"You are trespessing on his landship's ground; and it's my duty to take you up to the "one."

W

"My good fellow, you can't take me unless I choose to go!" drawing up his alight figure and looking down his delicate Greek nor at the keeper's burly form. "Your macked down on wish for any visiting, so I would not interrupt him for the world!"

"Might I ask how you happened to gain?"

looking suspicious.

"I got in, and I mean to get out. How is your master?"

"My master in doing pretty well-least-ways, as well as a gentleman of his age can manage with a ballet in his chart. But you,

"Never wind me. I'm in perfect health. How did the bullet get into the poor old gentle-

"That's more than I can say. Mr. Philip was with him, and the pistel was fired; but I don't rightly know who fired it, or who brought it there. His w queer story, and I can't make out the rights of it. But I must trouble you to move off."

"I'm going. Is the old fellow going to "The old fellow, indeed! I like your impudence. You be off! You be up to no good here, and it's my duty to see you off the pre-

"I needn't trouble you. Look here, old man! I owe you something for giving you such a run," holding out a sovereign. "Is Mr. Falconer likely to stay here long?

"Thank ye, sir," pocketing it quickly.
"Thank ye, sir," pocketing it quickly.
"I'm sure I don't know; nobody knows when he goes, or when he comes. He's a sharp un, he is, and it don't require three pair of eyes to see what he's up to this arternoon."
"Nonsense! He's old enough to be her father," the blood rushing to his good-looking Davis's eyes twinkled.

"La, sir, you took my meaning as sharp as a ferret. Seems as how you might be playing the same game yerself?"

Fred Sinclair cursed his own stupidity, but did not lose his presence of mind.
"And if I were—could I count on your assistance?

"It's nothing against his lordship?" doubt-fully.

"Nothing on earth to do with him."
"Nor against the Captain?"
"Oraced. Captain Falconer w "If I succeed, Captain Falconer will owe me a debt of gratitude," he suid, confidently, relying more than was wise upon what the Prelying more than was wise upon what the Dachess had told him.

"Then I'm your man," enthusiastically, "There's not one of us but would do all we knows of for the Captain."

"That's all right. Now, look here. I must speak to Miss Macdonald as soon as possible; but Mr. Falconer must not know anything of it. Tie a wisp of straw whenever he's hanging about on the outside handle of the posterngate, and keep your eyes open for me, when I'm here."

Davis promised that he would, and chuckled to himself with delight at the idea of defeating Mr. Philip, who was no favourite with any of the dependants. He asked again how Fred had managed to get in, but he shook him head, and turned it off with a laugh saying, "Where

For a long time Sinclair hung about but was only rewarded by a sight of Nora in the distance, dismounting at the front door. He blew her a kiss, which the wind refused to take her, and went back disconsolately to the Castle, feeling much like a hungry child who has been staring at cakes through the glass of a confectioner's window—a very unsatisfactory pastime.

CHAPTER XXI.

Fon a whole week Philip Falconer stayed on as Mountfalcon, steadily working his way in Nors's favour, till her suspicious were lulled to rest one by one, and she was assumed to remumber all the evil she had believed of to remember all the evil and man between him. On Easter Sanday they drove together in the old-fashioned barouche, with its pair of fash, superannuated horses, to a small church fash, superannuated horses, to a small church distance, where Falconer calcula that the Duchess would probably perform her

For reasons of his own he was very anxious to be seen alone with Nora Mac-denald, though he was equally anxious to keep her from speaking to any of her friends. He did not think it was likely that any of them would come to that out of the way little them would come to that out of the way little church; and it was with a feeling of positive dismay that he saw the party from the Castle file up the aids in the middle of the Pealms, the Ducheau, gargeous in scalahin and sable, leading the way, followed by her sister and Fred Sinolsir, whom he did not know. Roy. Falcener, looking handsome and haughty as ever, bringing up the rear. Nora's heart nearly leapt out of her bosom, and her cheeks went deathly pale, as she kept her eyes glund to the prayer-book which she was holding unconsciously upside down.

Ohl how fervently she wished Philip at

Ohl how feremity she wished Philip at the furthest end of the world; for he sat class into her pocket, looked over the same hymn-book, which distracted her thoughts entirely from the beautiful Easter hymn, and paid her every officious atten-tion he could think of.

He went so far as to rqueeze a half-orown into her hand when she was feeling for her purse; but that she would not stand, and she jerked her fivgers away with such energy that the coin rolled with a load noise on to the tesselsted pave-ment. Fred Singlair looked round with a broad grin, Roy Falconer with a stern stare, and Nora with crimson cheeks felt inand Nora with crimson oncess less in-clined to creep under the saat. When the service was over the Caştle party streamed out, as if in a hurry; but, when Nora followed, they were still blocking when Nors followed, they were and up the path in the churchyard. Philip went forward to speak to the Duchess, Nora hung back, and was pounced on by Fred. Roy back, and was pounced on by Fred. Roy raised his bat as if to a comparative stranger, and stood aloof talking to Lady Alles,

"This is the most delightful and exquisite surprise!" said Sinclair, with a most impres-sive squeeze of the small hand which was intrusted to him for half a minute. " At last I've got the chance I've been longing for I Why do you never come to the White Ash? Didn't you see my appeal in the agony column? Didn't you see me bahind the thorn when you dashed past with that insufferable cad? Do you know that I've been there day after day?"

"No; of course I didn't. But why are you with the Duchess? You are not a friend of hers, are you?" looking up at him with anxious eyes, which he thought were the loveliest that he had ever seen.

loveliest that he had ever seen.

He remembered that, for some reason that, he knew nothing about, he was on no account to mention that he came from the Castle.

"A feland? That's a strong term. You

"A friend? That's a strong term. You see, her place is nearer to Mountfalcon than the Chase; and we must make use of people sometimes, you know," he answered, vaguely.
On! it he would only take himself off! Was

Roy never going to speak to her? It was too ignominious to stand there as if she was wait-ing for him! too dreadful to be supposed to be engrossed with this stranger!

"There's such a curious little tomb there I want to look at," she said suddenly; and, suiting the action to the word, she hurried across the grass to an old, lichen covered grave with an indecipherable inscription.

Fred was delighted. He thought it a transparent excuse for a more secluded tête à-tête.

and his confidence grew apace.

He said one audacious thing after another, and was never rebuked, for Nora scarcely heard a word he said as she watched the group by the church door in an agony of mind.

"Mr. Falconer has told the truth," she thought, with extreme bitterness. "That must be Lasty Alice, and he can't tear himself away from her, even to speak to an old friend. I wish I had never seen him!"

The next moment a tall figure came striding moss the graves. A deep voice said,—

"Just allow me a few words with Miss Mac-donald;" and, as Fred stopped aside with a laugh and a bow, she leant against the old grey betone for support, as a sudden weak seemed to have attacked her knees as well as her heart.

Roy looked at the sweet, young face, the tears resting on the long, silken lashes, the tremble about the pretty lies, and involuntarily his eyes softened.

"Will you be kind enough tell me the truth about my grandfather?" he asked, anxiously.
"I've heard such a cock and bull story that I don't know what to believe. Is it true that he has been shot in the chest?"

She could not raise her eyes to his as he tood bareheaded in the sun before her, with all the deference of a perfect gentleman, but with an icy coldness which seemed to stab her heart with a frozen knife.

Was this the meeting she had longed for, as

"Yes; quite true," she said, softly. "He had been ill all day, but in the middle of the night he got up. You know he keeps a heap money in one of the rooms on the firstfloor ?

"Who? my grandfather? Are you sure? Do you know it for a fact?" in intense surprise.

"Yes; Mr. Falconer told me."

"Ah! he knew of it, I'd bet anything," "Yes; and he kindly sat up all night, scause he knew that Lord Mountfalcon bacause walked in his sleep, and he thought he might hurt himself." I suppose the money had nothing to do with it? in a sarcastic tone.

As he said it, all Nora's first suspicions came back upon her with a rush; but she went on as if he had not spoken, feeling that it would be disloyal to say anything against Philip after his past kindness.

Lord Mountfalcon took him for a burglar, and was going to shoot him, but Mr. Falcones canght it from his hand, and the revolver went off.

"My uncle was alone with my grandfather in the room with the money when this hap-pened?" he said, slowly. "Did anyone hear the pistol shot?"

"Yes; I did, and rushed out, screaming 'Murder!"

"You went to that room?"
"Yes. It was pitch dark, and I was so frightened!" shuddering.

"It was awfully plucky!" with a sudden gleam in his eyes. "What would have hap-pened if you hadn't gone?"

She shrugged her graceful shoulders.
"Venables would have come; I waen's much good." He did not answer, but seemed lost in thought.

Fred Sinclair gave an impatient cough, to which nobody paid the smallest attention.

Presently Roy asked if the old man were in

"No. They wouldn't send for a doctor;

but Venables managed everything. "My uncle has been there ever since?" with a frown. Yes; he said he was so anxious, he could

["BULLOS, YOU THERE! I'LL TROUBLE YOU TO STOP. YOU'VE NO BUSINESS IN THEM COVERS!"]

Roy came a step nearer.
"Go home, child I go home at once I Mount-falcon is no place for you!" he said, in a low but very extract voice.

She shook her head with a smile.

"You must," he said imperatively. "Go before it is too late, before—your youth is spoilt."

"In a year—only part of a year more!" her colour coming and going.

His face grew stern, as he bent his head, and said, almost in a whisper,—

"Be warned in time; there are worse ills

"Be warned in time; there are worse his than poverty."
"I'm afraid of nothing, if I only succeed!" a joyous light in her eyes. "And won't you be glad, too?" venturing one eager glance up into his handsome face, as she felt an intense craving for one word of encouragement.
"Glad!" he cried in amazement. "What do you think I'm made of? I could love you, child, with little have feet and a ranged frock.

child, with little bare feet, and a ragged frock, but as heiress to Mountfalcon I should hate you!"

She stepped back as if he had dealt her a

"Captain Falconer !"Her lips trembled. She could say no more.

"And that, not because of the paltry money," he went on hotly, "but because you would have proved yourself a fit bride for my uncle. I wish you both joy!"

He was gone, and Nora stood still as the stone monuments about her, a greater stillness in her heart, as if something had died there.

there.

She had sacrificed everything for Roy Falconer. She had torn herself from her only home. She had given up her freedom. She had offended all her friends, she had ruined the brightness of her youth—all for him, and this was her reward !

The Duchess's landau drove off; the spirited borses jingling their harness, and making as much noise as they could with their hoofs on the hard road, Fred Sinclair waving his hat with fervent enthusiasm, Roy looking straight before him, with as stern a face as if he were in front of the enemy's guns.

in iront of the enemy's guns.

"I'm surprised at you, Roy," said the Duchess, pettishly, as ahe nevertheless threw him a large share of the sable rug. "That girl has proved herself perfectly despicable, and is going to marry your bitterest enemy!"

"Not if I can help it!"

A lock of alarm came into Marion's proud

"You ought to have nothing to do with her.

She is cheating you out of your birthright."
"I threw it away like Esau; somebody must pick it up," he said, with a frown.

"Miss Macdonald has the sweetest face I ever saw," said Lady Alice, gently. "If I were a man, I would save her from that horrid Mr.

"My hands are tied," said, Roy gloomily.
"But mine are not," cried Fred, joyonsly.
"What will you bet that I don't cut him

Roy flashed him a withering glance that ought to have settled his impudence for ever.

"I don't bet about women!"
Fred flushed, but stood to his guns.

"Ob, hang it, you know, the bet was about myself. Won't anyone back me against a dried-up elderly, sour faced cad, who is old enough to be her father?" looking entreatingly from one to the other. from one to the other.

"I will. Fred. I think you are sure to win," "I will. Fred. I think you are sure to win," said the Duchess, encouragingly. "That is to say, if you can get into Bluebeard's Tower," recollecting the need for secreey. "You have my heartlest wishes for your success."
"Might I ask why?" said Roy, looking straight into her face with stern eyes. How he hated this foolish stuck-up boy, who seemed to thick that he had nothing to do he to the straight.

to think that he had nothing to do but to ask and to have !

The pale, proud face of the Duchess of Yorkshire grew crimson, as she realised what her motive was, and felt she must die rather than confess it. Her eyes sank beneath his steady gaze. She bit her lip till she broke the skin. Her bosom heaved tumultuously, but without a word she leant back against the cushions, and drew a deep breath of endless longing as she pressed her wedding-ring in a convulsive clasp.

Oh, for freedom—freedom from the most hateful—the most useless tie—on earth!

As if in answer to her wild thoughts the coachman pulled up his horses, as a mounted messenger dashed up to the side of the carriage.

"Please, your Grace," said the messenger, touching his cap, "the Duke has had a fit, and I'm on my way to fetch the doctor."

"The man and don't stop. Gregory," to

"Then go on, and don't stop. Gregory," to the coachman, "drive as fast as you can." "Don't be frightened, dear," whispered Lady Alice, "a fit might do poor Honiton

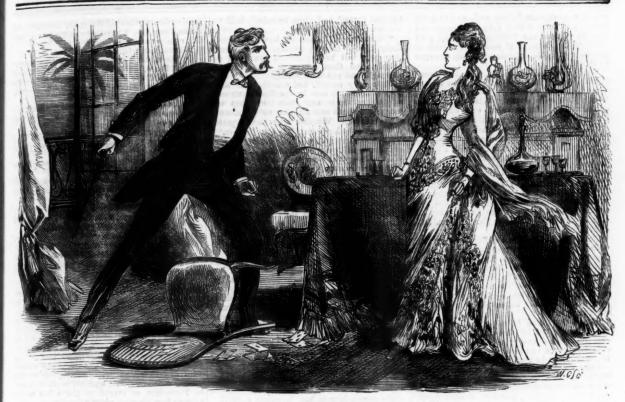

"It couldn't do him harm, could it?" with a bitter smile. "He couldn't be worse than he is."

"Yes," said Roy, very quietly. "Your husband is so helpless and harmless. If he were violent, how terrible it would be for you!"

"Not worse," in a very low voice. "He might kill me then, and what have I to live for?" a cry which only Heaven could hear going up from her closed lips.

(To be continued.)

Sonnow is not an accident, occurring now and then. It is the roof which is woven into the warp of life, and he who has not discerned the divine sacredness of sorrow, and the profound meaning which is concealed in pain, has yet to learn what life is. The cross, manifested as the necessity of the highest life, alone interprets it.

[SHE UTTERED BUT ONE WORD, HURLED AT BIM WITH ALL THE VEHEMENCE OF BER OUTRAGED SPIRIT-"COWARD!"]

BOVELETTE 1

ns he st

ã

TEMPEST TOSSED.

-:0:-

CHAPTER I.

"A THOUSAND to one on the Duke!" "He romps in an easy winner!" "Well done, Cherry-and-White!" "Skylark is nowhere!" Hurrah!"

Suchwere the shouts that greeted the cluster of horses and jockeys as they dashed round Tattenham Corner on this bright, sunny after Another Derby had been won-and lost. The bookmakers were jubilant; the Duke had started at twenty to one, and even at that price had secured but few friends.

Skylark had started a hot favourite, but had only been able, although ridden by the first jockey of the day, to obtain third place.

As the numbers were hoisted up, a hoarse murmur, which presently broke into a tremendous roar, sounded over the expansive downs.

Even those who had lost small stakes joined in the cheering and joyful abouts, for the Marquis of Croxteth, the owner of the Duke, was the most popular patron of the turf; and few there were who begradged him the honour of winning the coveted blue ribbon.
On the Grand Stand, and in Tattersall's enclosure, however, there were many gloomy faces, for Skylark had been looked upon as a "moral cortainty," and the gilded youth of England had plunged heavily.

Near the rails stood a tall, handsome-looking man of about thirty-five, who viciously gnawed at the ends of his long, tawny mous-

"Hullo, Bertie! where have you been hid-ing all this time? Not heavily hit over the Date, eh? You look as pleasant as a rainy day in October!"

The speaker, a delicate looking man of some twenty-five years, was the Honourable George Herrington, seventh Earl of Basingstoks, whose general appearance testified to the rackety life he had led ever since he left Etop.

The one addressed as Bertie turned hastily round.

"I didn't know you were coming, Basing-stoke," he said, with a careless drawl. "You stoke," he said, with a careless drawi. "You said yesterday you shouldn't."

"Did I? 'Pon my soul, I forget! Fact is, though, Flora made me. 'Pon my honour, I didn't want to come. This noise and crush and bustle isn't my form just at present."
"Egad, though, I'm jolly glad I did come, though. It was one of the finest races I ever you and I'm jolly glad. Crayteth has won.

saw run; and I'm jolly glad Croxteth has won—though it will cost me a monkey. You backed Skylark, too; I hope you hedged, old

"I never hedge; you know that!" replied the Honourable Bertie Wilmot, savagely. "I shall have to stand the racket."

"Wilmot's hard hit," said the young Earl Then he laid his hand kindly on the other's "Come and have a snack with us, old chap.

Plenty of time between this and Monday to brood over your losses. Besides, Lady Flora will never forgive me if I tell her I have seen you and not brought you with me."

Bertie Wilmot gave a slight deprecatory shrug of his broad shoulders, and then allowed the Earl to link his arm within his own, and lead him towards the drsg.

Flora Herrington saw them coming, and as she recognised the stalwart figure of Wilmot a deep flush suffused her peach-like cheek.

"Well, I declare! Basingstoke is bringing Captain Wilmot of the Blues. I am so glad! There will be someone to talk to now. You have never met Captain Wilmot, Miss Chester?" she said, patronisingly, turning to her companion, a fair, gentle-looking girl of about twenty.

"No, Lady Flora, I have met but few people in England," replied Miss Chester.

"All my life has been passed in India. I told you when you engaged me that I had lived there until—"

A lump seemed to rise in her throat. large, deep-tinted, azure eyes filled with tears, and she could say no more.

"Ab, yes, I think you did tell me that you only came to England after the death of your father, the Colonel," said Lady Flora, indifferent the country of the colonel, and the colonel of th rently, toying with the flowers attached to her

Beryl Chester heaved a deep sigh, and her thoughts wandered away to the secluded sta-tion up in the North-West Provinces, and the gentle hearted, soldierly man who had been both father and mother to her.

She was aroused from her reverie by the voice of Lady Flora.

"This is Captain Wilmot, Miss Chester!"
She raised her long, dark lashes, upon which the tears hung like pendant jewels, and she involuntarily lowered them before the bold involuntarily lowered them before the bold gaze of the Captain.

"What a splendid little creature!" thought he. "Dowdily dressed, but, for all that, a perfect picture!"

"Delighted, I am sure," he said aloud, "to make your acquaintance, Miss Chester. What did you think of the race?"

She looked up quickly, and was relieved to find that he had directed his gaze towards Lady Flora's cerise-clad figure.

"I simply thought is magnificent," replied Lady Flora, with animation, her dark eyes sparkling, and her full, red lips quivering with excitement. "I never saw a finer Derby

"And what did you think of it, Miss Chester?" he asked, gently.

Beryl blushed.

"I can scarcely say," she replied. "I never

Ap

marri

es gai worke

Th разві never and t deter

a hea

amid WO30

Fi

Wat !

beso Ve her | and

L her. ratio

his I th

the "W 60 ? Fio

my for

Sir you qua hal and eff.

dr

681

eti eti

(DS

of

ye

W

was on a racecourse before, and-and it is all so new and strange that I have exercely had time to analyse my feelings. It is all very exciting, but I think it seems very cruel to punish such noble animals with whip and spur as they do."

Wilmot smiled cynically. He had heard the same scatterents attered before by women —women who themselves, when on the Row, wore spurs with sharp rowels projecting a quarter of an inch or more, and who nover hesitated in using them mercileasly.

"There are many more cruel actions than horse-racing," he said, giving a quick, almost norse-rang," he said, giving a quick, almost ferce glance in the direction of Lady Flora. The latter uttered a short, silvery, taugh. "Don't let us begin moralizing on a Derby day," she said, lightly. "Il thenk you for a little of that chicken salad, Basingatoke." "A pressy little girl, but denoed quick. It wonder who sho is I The fair Flora did not seem to like so much notice being taken of har. I must inquire of the Earl; he couldn't keep a secret if he tried."

keep a secret if he tried."

Thus did the Honourable Bertie community with himself as he slood before the glass dressed in finalling attire for the ball to be dressed in fin dressed in firstless attire for the ball to be given that night by the Earl of Basingstoke at the family massion in Manchesters quare. This ball was use of the most select of the season, and Indy Flora's gilded passishoneds were looked upon as valued treasures by their recipients.

These balls had been an institution for many years, but on the death of the late earl the present one would gladly have discontinued them had it not bear for his course.

who ruled him in almost everything.

Lady Flora Herrington was of noble family. had a superb figure and carriage, regular for-tures, perfect complexion, but she was poor and this poverty had, perhaps, something to do with her, violent, passionate temper.

She was of the same age as the Earl, and they had been playmates and companions from their earliest childhood; but although the young nobleman had a brotherly affection and admiration for his clever and beautiful cousin, this had never developed into anything more serious, and Lady Flora knew that at some time or other she would have to resign her position as head of the Besingstokehousehold to another.

Of course she had received many offers of marriage, but none frem those whom she sidered desirable or enitable. Her fastidious ness might, perhaps, he pressy well accounted for by the fancy the had taken from the first day of their acquaintance to Captain Bertie Wilmot, who, in point of worldly goods, was almost as poor as herself.

"The fact is, Flora," he had said, after a strong scene in the grounds of Basingstoke House, a couple of years before the commencement of this story, " I am too jolly to keep myself, let alone a wife. I could not think of condemning you to a life of poverty and misery. If the guv'nor hall asted differently all might have been well; but, as it is, we must suffer as patiently as we can:"

Flora Herrington saw through his selfishness at once, but still she could not at a moment's notice conquer her passion, graceless as she knew the object of it to be.

With his five hundred a year and her two they might have lived, if not in luxury, at least in medest comfort; besides, the Earl bad great influence with the Government of the day, and some post might be found for the guardsman.

The Honourable Bertie shrugged

the first the first the supplied his shoulders and elevated his system with wouldn't answer, Plans, he said coolly, I am naturally lary, and should lose the post in a week. We must consent to be post in a week, only friends."

A violent scene then took place.

All the woman's sent was incorred. She poured forth, with all the vehemence of her passionate and haughty spirit, a torrent of upbraidings and receiminations.

hausted herself, and then he calmly held out getting deuced short of the ready if something

"We shall not be any the less fast friends, Lady Flora," he said, quietly. "In a week's time you will have reasoned the thing out calmly, and then you will acknowled."
was right and you were wrong."

Then they parted, but a week later was they accidentally met in the Row, each we a pleasant smile, and their friendship w a pleasant smile, and their rriemanny werenewed without any allusion to the scene of a week before. Whether they had forgotten it was a secret locked in their own breats. So things had gone on until this Derry day;

and now, although the Honourable and now, although the Honourable Besieville. Wilmot knew he was on the very brink of roin and diagrace, he calmly looked in the glass to see if his tie was straight, and lightly communed concerning the identity of the petite beauty he had seen in Lord Basing atohe's drag.

In the midst of it his valet entered to talk him his cab was waiting.

"One o'clock, is it? By Jove, here the time flies!" and humming a military ditty, he descended the stairs.

"Your ways was late. I thought you ware."

"You are very late. I thought you v not comica."

It was Indy Flora who spoke these few words, in a low, confidential tone.

Very beautiful did the look in her abtorners ing hallotrope satin dress, laviably trimmed with point of Alescon lace and seed pearlembroidery, a splendid wreath of white helicarope adding leates to the set marble like gleam of her white throat and bosom, on which gittered a costly brilliant pendant.

He looked down at her with admiration as he found her tiny glove in his.

a found her tiny glove in his.
" Should you have cared?" he saked, with gleam of passion in his dark eyes.

She gave a deep sigh. "I suppose I should a little," she said, with a forced laugh; "but better late than "Don't, please, Lady Flora," he said, with mock plaintiveness. "Have a little mercy. I am not a dancing man, and the only one I care for dancing with at all is—yourself."

"I am sorry I cannot consent to monopolise so desirable a partner as the gallant Captain Wilmon," she said.

"At least you will give me two dances for the sake of old times, Flora?" he pleaded,

A slight frown contracted her brows, but this quickly passed away. "I will consent on one condition. You shall dance with Lady Alice Guthrie first."

He gave a grimace. "It would be parfect torture! She is at least forty, and as bony as a skeleton !"
Lady Flora laughed. Often did her silvery laugh ring out when ill-natured remarks were made concerning her friends (2)

"You know the conditions," she said, firmly, holding out her programme.

He took it, and excibbled his name in two of the vacant places.

"Even this sacrifica will I make at thy shrine, fair goddess," he said, half in jest, half in earnest.

Flora Herrington hid her blush of gratification behind her fan, and just then her partner came up to claim her for the next waltz.

It was the Marquis of Croxteth, and as Wilmot shock his head a heavy cloud passed over his face.

"The man to whom I owe my ruin !" he muttered, "and yet I am supposed to meet him with a smiling face. A thousand curses on him. I could strike him dead where he stands!"

"Well, Bertie, recovered from the dumps, ch? Come along and have a drop of 'fiz,' a wonderful thing for enlivening anyone. I suppose you find this awfully dull?—so do I. But one has to sacrifice themselves occasionbared forth, with all the veltemence of her ally on the alter of the proprieties. What do you think of the chance of Rupert for the phraidings and recommendations.

Wilmot waited patiently until she had ex-doesn't turn up. I have been down on my luck for nearly two years now." Wilmot turned slightly pale.

Wilmot turned slightly pals.

In his selfish, heartless way he was really and of Flora, and had almost decided upon the selfish and had almost decided upon the selfish and had been down with the mands as a down for his cousin, and the in his present difficulties.

This statement as to the Hasingstoke transport of the selfish as a surprise, and a pleasant one either.

It think I should hedge Basingstoke," he stonly, "Rupert is not going very well

A misonaly.

the but then, you see, those people and they near be ringing it."

you self," replied Wilmot, colly, named to having his navice treated itality.

"Of course," said the Earl, neutralantly;
"but all the same, old fellow, I am much obliged to you, and shall follow your advise."

"By the bys, Basingstoke," said the Captain, during a passe in the Earl's foolish chatter, "who is the Miss Chester that we my your drag to day? I don't see her/in the ball rocus."

The Earl gave a grin.
"Not struck, I hope, Bartie. I told Flera it was searcely the correct thing, you know, but—ex—she would do it and—ex—Miss Chester ain't a bad looking filly, and abe has blood in her, ton. High action, by Jovet" he added, colouring as he remembered a rocan rebuil he had met at her bands; "but, don't you know, one must draw the line somewhere, and though you would chaff with a groom in the stable yard, or lark with a pretty housemaid on the tairs, a fellow would scarcely walk with one in Piccadilly, or introduce the other to his in Piccadilly, or introduce the other to his friends in a drawing room."

"What on earth are you talking about? You surely would not compare Miss Chester to either a groom or a housemaid?"

Again the Earl's face coloured. "Well-er-no, scarcely that, don't you know, but yet she is a servant after all, though one doesn't pay a license. She is Lady Flora's companion."

Wilmot started back.

"A paid companion?"

"Ya—as," drawled Basingstoke, adjusting his cravat. "Her father was an Indian colonel, but he muddled his affairs, and get his property into Chancery, don't you know. Consequence was when the old 'un pegged out the filly was left to make her own run-The guardsman shrugged his shoulders.

"Pity for her," he said, coolly; "seems rather well bred." "A regular high stepper, and knows as much, out of books, you know, as if she was senior wrangler. Lady Flore, gets her cheapthough, and she is a rather olaver girl."

Nearly all Bertle's interest had field, and he was almost glad when the dance for which he was engaged to Lady. Alice came round that he might have a good excuse for making his escape from the Earl's inanities.

"The penance is over and now I claim my raward," he said a listle later, as he stood before Flora Herrington.

The haughty woman's eyes flushed with triumph.

She knew that Bertie Wilmot was still her captive, and her heart bounded with joy. She knew that he was not a good man; she knew that he was a selfah one; but yet he was brave and handsome; he was respected by men and adored by women, and she felt a thrill of delight at her trimph over his cautioneness and unimpressionable spirit.

The dance was to her one short period of happiness, and she abandoned herself entirely to its enjoyment.

For Bertie, too, the moment was one of joy and pleasure. He knew that this handsome, imperious, wayward creature loved him, and his vanity was gratified.

He had now nothing to love, and by this mething

my luck

s really ed upon wn with consin.

nke trea.

mrprise,

olie," he ory well

oplante

, coldly, treated

lantly; n much advice." he Cap.

foolish

Flora

Ches-clood in added, bnff be know.

though stable on the

to his ester to know,

h one lora's

usting

ndian

d got know. runs. 109m3

72 83

ERW C

heap, ch he that

g his laim with

1 her

et he ested elt a canto be irely joy and marriage he might retrieve his fortune, as well as gain possession of this exquisite piace of workmanship in flesh and blood.

There was nothing noble or pure about his passion. It was of the world worldly; but, nevertheless, it had tangibility and substance, and throwing of his former self-restraint he determined to let it have its way.

When the dance was over he led har through a heavy velvet portion into the conservatory; and there, in the subdued coloured light, amidst the tropical plants with which it was crowded, they found a small reastic seat.

Flora Herrington knew instinctively what was about to happen, and the heaving of her beam proclaimed her agitation.

Very little love was there in her emotion; her principal feeling was one of proud triumph and gratification.

Loading her to the seat, he stood before her, gazing down upon her in unfeigned admiration.

Flora, he said, with a slight treuror in the seat of the said.

ration.
"Flora," he said, with a slight tremor in his voice, "I must speak to you. I never knew that two years ago I misjudged mysolf. I thought I was stronger than I are."
"I sourcely understand you, Captain Wilmot," she said, coldly, although it was with the utmost difficulty she kept her voice steady.

"We were to be friends, have we not been 60 ? 1

"You have been all that is good and kind, Flora, and I am deeply grateful. You thought my prudence was prompted by selfishness."
"Hullon! here you are. I've been looking for you everywhere, Bertie. Never thought of you sticking yourselves in this damp; hole. Sir Charles is looking for you, Flora. He says you promised him this damos. I can't afford to quarrel with Fornyth you know," he added, half apologetically to Wilmos.

The Captain mattered; au inaudible reply, and Lady Flora, with a look of anything but affection at her kinsman, swept from the conservatory.

As soon as she had departed the little-Earl dragged Bertie foreibly into a corner.

"Is there any truth in it?" he saked, seriously.

" Truth in what?"

"In what these fellows are saying. They say the Dake has broke you, that it you square up on Monday you will not have a civer left."

Wilmot's face grew deathly pale with nassion.

"How dare they ?" he cried, fiercely.

Basingstoke qualled before the stern ageny of this strong, passionate man.

"Itian't my fault," he murmured. "I said it was none of their business; but I thought it
was none of their business; but I thought it
was none of their business; but I thought it
was none of their business; but I thought it
was none of their business; but I thought it
was none of their business; but I thought it you I could let you have it, don't you know."

Battis Wilmot staggered back; his whole coul in arms at the coarsoness of the Fark.

Betts Wimos staggered back, his whose coal in arms at the coarsences of the Earl.

"It is not quite so had as that Basing stoke," with the utmost difficulty suppressing his passion; "but I thank you, mover theless, and may, perhaps, avail myself of your kindness for a few days, although I believe there will be no accessity."

CHAPTER II.

Lany Flora Herrineron was ill at ease, She paced feverishly up and down her protty little nest of a bondoir with quick, short-teps, her fingers nessonely entwined in each

A fortnight had passed, and during that time she had seen nothing of the Honourable Bertie Wilmot, nor could the Earl supply her with any information on the subject.

Then the Monday following the Derby, Wilmot's debt of honour had been duly met by a commissioner; but he himself had been seen neither in the park, on parade, or on the race-

Suddenly she paused in her walk, and rung

"Ten Mass Chester I want her," she said to the maid who answered the summons.

"Miss Chester, I am going for a drive, and I want you to accompany me. Do not keep me waiting!"

"I shall be ready in five minutes, Lady Flora," replied Beryl, meekly, although a rich carnation suffased her cheeks at the other's domineering tone.

"That is right, I am going in the Park. I want to mest one of Captain Wilmot's brother officers, if I can. He may, perhaps, know what has become of the runaway,"

The crimson on the girl's face increased at the name of Wilmot, and she hurriedly left the

"A strange creature!" murmured Lady Flora; "blushes like a school-girl when she is spoken to."

The drive was a fruitess one, No one had heard anything of Bertie. On the day following the Derby he had sent down to the barracks to say he was going away for a few days, but had not said where to.

Her ladyship was in anything but an amiable mood upon her return to Manchester-equare, and her French maid, Marie, was almost driven to distraction by her whims and fancies as she was dressing her for dinner.

"You are a careless, useless creature," she cried, fairly bubbling, over with weath. "There, that will do, I cannot stand you any longer. You may go; but send Miss Chester here. I want her to write a couple of letters."

Delighted to escape from her irritable mistress, Marie promptly made her exit.

"Mademoisella is angered that she has not seen Monsieur the Captain. Ha! le pauvre gentilhomme. If he ever marries her ha has my nits!"

my pity!"
With a shrug of her shoulders she made her way to Beryl's room.

Receiving no answer to her summons she entered.

It was empty.

Marie shrugged her shoulders.

"Mademoiselle will again be in a rage.
Ha, I am the most unfortunate. I shall return to la belle France. To remain, it is impossible!"

She noticed a small, crumpled note lying on the floor. In an instant her curiosity was aroused.

"So'l le petite mademoiselle, she is not the innocent child she does appear. Ha! this will be a revenge over mi ladi. She calls me fool, idiot! We shall see now what we shall see!"

After reading the note, she, grasping it firmly in her hand, made her way to her ladyship's dressing room.

When they alighted from their carriage after the drive in the park Beryl made her way directly to her own room. She paced nervously up and down the chamber.

"How wicked, how mean, how contemptible I feel!" she cried, her face flushing a deep crimson. "Why was I persuaded, and yet, what could I do? He pleaded so hard, his eyes expressed the feelings of his soul. He read my secret at once!"

She heaved a deep sigh, and sank down into her chair overcome by a feeling of shame.

"I feel like a traitor. This must not go on. it must end once for alt. I cannot act the part he would have me act. No, no—a thousand times, no."

sand times, no."

She took off her mantle and hat, and drawing her Davenport to her tried to write.

But the pen never moved.
"I cannot do it," she moaned, the tears flooding her fair, rounded cheeks. "No, no, I cannot."

"I cannot do it," she moaned, the tears flooding her fair, rounded oheeks. "No, no, I cannot." She sprang to her feet and choked back her sobs.

"Am I a coward?" she cried, vehemently.
"T, the daughter of a soldier, an arrant coward, that I thus dread to indict the alightest pain upon myself! It is impossible!

"Tell Miss Chester I want her," she said Better do it at once, I have been weak, but now I shall be strong."

Compressing her lips firmly together, she sat down once more, and took up the penses to the date she was interrupted by a loud tap at her door.

With a cry of impatience she opened it,

"A. letter, miss," said the footman with a slight grin.

She seatched at the note eagerly. She saw was from him.

Tearing is open she read the contents.

A cry of pain escaped from han lips, and she reeled back, her face pallid as that of a orpse.

"Leaving England, perhaps for ever," she minumed. "It has coment last. I am sufficiently annished for my treschess and decit."
Taking up her hat and mantis she put them carelessly on, and then almost flow down the stairs and out into the open air—dewn Dukestreet and into Oxford street.

Here all was noise and bustle. Hansoms, broughams, open carriages, 'buses, vans and carts, were passing and repassing in endless confusion.

Do you want to cross, miss?" asked a policeman, who was attracted by her pure, beautiful face, and small, shrinking figure.

"No, I want a conveyance," she said, timidly, for she was a comparative stranger in this great, whirling, restless city.
" Bus or 'ansom, miss?"
" I want to go to Regent's Park!"

"A 'ansom 'Il be best, miss. Hi, there, ansom ! "

"Rather a refined un, but good natured, like the rest," he muttered, as he looked at the half-grown she had slipped into his hand. Exther a pity after all; seems too good for St. John's Wood, that she do."

And with a sympathiaing sigh X 29 pocketed the liberal doneer and resumed his best.
With a palpitating heart and pale cheek.
Becyl entered the park,
She looked eagerly from side to side.
No one was to be seen.

"I am lare, and perhaps he could not wait," she said, her heart sinking. Miss Chester, you are here! How good, how generous, of you! She turned quickly around, and the next moment both of her hands were grasped by Captain Bertie Wilmot's.

"I feared you would be angry, he said, as they walked beneath the bright green leafy branches.

"Angry?" she asked, opening wide her large, zure eyes. "Why should I have been? Had you not written I might not have had the opportunity of bidding you good-bye.

He looked rather disconcerted at her

"But still it was very good of you. I want to speak to you seriously, Baryl." She gave a slight start; it was the first time be had called her by her Christian

"I can no longer keep silent," he continued, not noticing her discomposure. "I love you devotedly, as a man can never love hat once. Tell me, darling, can I hope, dare I hope, that you will ever return my love?"

She drew gently away from his side, her

She drew gently away from his side, her lips quivering and her eyes filling, with tears.

"This is madness, Captaia Wilmot. As you know, I am a penniless girl, carning, my own living, You told me you were in trouble By yourself you might fight and conquer adversity, but with a wife to waigh you down it would be very different."

"He winced slightly at the word wife.

"But tell me, Beryl, do you love me?" he demended.

dif

kn

vei alc

hi

sti

m

101

CB

at ea

ho

10

L

bi

80

8.

you know, and yet you refuse me the slightest comfort during my exile."

All his drawling manner of speech had fied, and the words followed each other in hot and rapid succession.

pns succession.
Beryl sighed deeply.
"Spare me," she said, piteously.
A cry of joy escaped his lips.
They had strolled along an unfrequented path, and they were quite alone.

With a quick movement he encircled her waist with his strong arm, and drew her to his breast.

"You do love me, Beryl; you are mine and mine only,! "

He pressed his hot lips fervently to her cheek. For a moment she was in ecstasy, then a flood of shame swept over her, and dragging herself from his embrace she sank down on a seat and covered her face with her hands.

Bertie Wilmot looked at her curiously. He could neither understand nor appreciate her. For all his outside veneer of elegance and refinement the man's utmost soul was coarse as that of an untutored savage,

He approached her gently, and tried to withdraw her hands from her burning face; but she repulsed him.

that moment she felt she almost hated him.

Intuitively she saw that he had taken an unfair advantage of her youth and inexperience.

"Leave me!" she said, huskily.
"Never!" he replied boldly, more determined than ever to win the priceless treasure, which after winning he would value at nothing.

The pride of the man was aroused, the spirit of conquest had got him in its clutches, and though shame and misery might follow he recked not of the price to be paid for his triumph.

"Hear me, Beryl. Why should I leave England miserable and wretched, when the light of your eyes is sufficient to make me feel happy? Why should I be alone and forlorn, happy? Why should I be alone and lorion, when you can give me your love? Why, then, would you deny me? Think you not I am wretched enough without carrying about with me a broken heart?"

He paused, but she made no sign that she heard him.

A quick heaving of the bosom and a neryous twitching of the fingers told him, how ever, that she had not only heard, but that his words had produced an effect.

The devilieh spirit of the man rejoiced.

"Can it be," he continued, determined to make one grand, desperate stroke, "that you are selfish—that you are afraid of your own peace of mind?"

She drew her hands from her face and looked at him reproachfully.

That look was enough. He had conquered.

The breach in the fortress was practicable and the enemy had only to enter.

With cunningly devised phrases he combated her maidenly scruples one by one, and at last wrung the avowal from her lips that she loved him.

Alas for Beryl! Those few words were to cause her many a weary, restless night, many a sad, mournful day, and many a bitter tear.

But this she knew not; all seemed truthful and honourable, and she had no fear. An hour passed away in pleasant nothings with which lovers can so easily satisfy themselves, and then she arose.

Shall I tell Lady Flora?" she asked.

shyly.

He shrank back as though he had received

"Not for worlds!" he cried, hurriedly.

"Not for worlds!" he cried, nurriedly.
"But it looks so deceitful, Bertie, and—and she may question me, and I cannot tell her a lie! I felt as though I was acting one to-day."
"It would be madness—it would utterly ruin me! Surely you can manage for a week, darling! and by the end of that time my affairs will be settled, and we can start together for the Continent. You must not tell anybody at all."

"But our—our—"—she stammered and blushed—"marriage? Will they not know then?

then?"
It was his turn to flush now.
"Ob, yes, of course! I think we can manage that all right. Don't worry your little head about that, my aweet, little pet!"
She looked at him in some bewilderment.

But there are preliminaries to a-a marriage?

"Of course," he said, hurriedly, his brow contracted by a slight frown. "But that will be settled. I will see to all that, my dar-

She sighed, and clung closer to his arm.
She had given him the most precious gift she had to bestow, and henceforth she must trust and be guided by him.
He bent down and kissed her.
"I must see you to move the must be to the common of the must be the common of the

I must see you to morrow, my own darling!" he whispered.

She looked at him confidingly.

The next moment she was seated in a hansom, and being whirled away in the direction of Manchester-square.

CHAPTER III.

Berl Chester had barely taken off her outside garments when a knock was heard at outside garments when a knock was heard at the door, and Marie entered.

"Ah, mademoiselle, there is a tempest, a storm! Miladi is mad, wild, desperate—what shall I say? A very tigress would be as a heaven-born babe by her side. Mon Dieu! it is terrible!"

Beryl looked at the maid in astonish-

"What have I to do with this?" she de

"Your pardon, mademoiselle, but miladi said she wished to see you. It was when she heard you were out she flew into this passion. Ma foi / never did I see such before."

"Does Lady Flora require me?"

"Usi, mademoiselle. Therefore am I bere."

With quiet dignity Beryl swept past the garrilous Frenchwann and went straightte.

arrulous Frenchwoman, and went straight to Lady Flora's boudoir.

Her ladyship, attired in a rich dinner dress of deep blue velvet, was pacing furiously up and down.

"You sent for me, Lady Flora?" she said, shrinking back before the fierce gaze of the other.

"I did, Miss Chester," with a "I did, aniss Unester," with a ring of ineffable scorn in her voice. "I did send for you. Where have you been?"

"I have been out for a little time."

"No lies! You have been out ever since we returned from the Park."

Beryl remained silent.

"Do you dare deny it?"
"I said I had been out!"
"Yes; but you did not say with whom. I demand an answer!"

The girl's spirit was now thoroughly aroused. "I can give you no further information, Lady Flora," she said, with dignity. "I do not think you have any right to ask such questions!"

"Do you not? How dignified you have become. Yet I think, were I in your ple should have thought of my dignity before efore I entered into secret correspondence with my employer's visitor!"

Beryl turned deathly white, and clutched at the back of a chair for support.

Lady Flora experienced a fleroe feeling of triumph.

"That I have been greatly deceived in you I frankly admit," she continued. "I thought you pure, innocent and straightforward, instead of which I find you the reverse—cunning deceitful, aly, and, I fear, worse!"

"What do you mean?" demanded Beryl, almost says all.

almost savagely, and fearlessly confronting her accuser.

"I mean exactly what I say. I find out that you are in the habit of clandestinely meeting a man who is engaged to be married." The shot told; Beryl with difficulty could support herself.

The room seemed swimming around her, and the last four words rang in her ears like a death-knell. "Engaged to be married! It is not true," she said, helplessly.

Her ladyship uttered a long, mocking laugh. "It is true," she said, triumphantly. "On the Derby night Captain Wilmot asked me to be his wife, and I consented. Of course, I have no objection to him amusing himself, as I know there would be nothing serious between him and you. I am only shooked at your be-haviour. The daughter of an old and valiant haviour. The daughter of an old and value, cfficer should have more respect for heresif than allow any man to make a toy of her for the total hours."

The last thrust had a terrible effect. Beryl raised her hands with a look, half-pleading, half terrified, in her eyes, and then dropped senseless to the ground. Lady Flora gazed at her contemptuously.

"I believe she is only a weak, silly fool after all."

Then she rang the bell, and Marie entered the boudoir

"Miss Chester has fainted, Marie. See if you can do anything for her. If not, you had better send for Dr. Marshall. I can't keep the dinner waiting any longer."

As she left the room the maid compressed her lips.

"Cruel as steel is miladi," she murmured. "Why did I bring this about? Ever am I unfortunate. I thought to hurt her who has so often insulted me; but Mon Dicu/ I never meant to injure this pretty flower."

She ponced out a glass of water and bathed

Beryl's forchesd.

The girl's eyes slowly opened, and she gazet round the room. Then a violent shudder agitated her frame, and by a strenuous effort she rose to her feet.
"I have been ill, have I not?" she asked, wearily.

"Osi, mademoiselle, but you will soon be better. A little brandy and a good sleep."

"No, no, not sleep. I must act, and at once. I have been vilely insulted. I—."

She stopped, and then courtecusly declining any further assistance from the maid, staggered laboriously to her own room.

How lonely, how terribly lonely and missrble she felt ! Not a friend had she in the world; and he had proved false !

She tried to doubt the truth of Lady Flora's words, but could not.

Every little thing she had witnessed between them occurred to her. Their evident understanding on the race-course, Lady Flora's agitation, her visit even to the Park that day

—all stamped her statement with the trath.
Utterly friendless and alone as she was, she, however, determined that she would not stay another night beneath that roof.

She had still the address of the house in Kilbura where she had lodged before coming to Manchester square, and thither she would

Then on the morrow she could settle upon

Then on the morrow she could sessie upon some plan for the future.

With a weary heart, and an aching brain, she commenced to pack up her trunks, after which she wrapped herself up in her cloak and descended the broad staircase.

As she passed the dining-room door she heard the hard, cruel laugh of Lady Flora invitation.

ringing out.

This caused her to hurry her footsteps, and in another moment she was standing out upon the pavement.

Only anxious to escape from the house where she had been so miserable, she hurried down Duke street, and stood at the corner of Oxford-street, which was now almost deserted.

How different was its appearance from that 889, too ba estinely

arried.

y could nd her,

true," nocking

" Oa me to

Durse, I self, as etween

our beherealf her for

, half.

then ol after intered

See if

Can's ressed

nured.

am I bo has Dever

mihed

effori

aked.

on be once.

lining

stagnicar-

and he lora's

WE 6D

lors's

t day

she.

stay

ming apon

rain.

her

lora pon

ried er of it had presented a few hours before, and how different were her feelings!

Even the friendly policeman had disppeared, and there was no one near to hail a cab for her.

cab for her.

She would have walked, but she did not know which way to turn.

As she stood there half-bewildered, and still very weak and faint, a man came hurrying along from the direction of Bayswater, and almost ran against her.

He was a comparatively round man but almost ran against her.

He was a comparatively young man, but his sunbrown cheeks, which contrasted strangely with his light golden hair and moustache, and his large grey eyes, bespoke a long residence beneath a tropical sun.

He raised his hat, and apologised for his carelesspens.

carelessness.

She looked at him in a dazed manner that at once attracted his attention.

"Miss Chester, can it possibly be you?" he said, in a tone of mingled pain and surprise. She gave a little start of pleasure, which, however, instantly vanished before the remembrance of her misery and the shame whe had antifered.

ehe had suffered.

"Mr. Vaughan," she said, in a restrained tone.

"I never thought of seeing you in London ! "

Harry Vaughan sighed, and held out his band, but she did not notice it.

band, but she did not notice it.

He looked at her more closely, and saw the sgony she was suffering depicted in her white, coared looking face.

"Are you ill or in trouble, Beryl?" he said, softly. "Tell me, can I help you?"

"No, no, I am not ill, but I want a cab. I wish to go to Kilburn at once."

He hailed a passing vehicle and placed her carefully inside it, then he stood lingeringly at the step.

carefully inside it, then he stood higher of the step.

"May I accompany you?" he asked wistfully.

"I have been looking all over England for you, and now my furlough is nearly up."

She gave him the longed for permission, and as he seated himself beside her she knew she was not without one true and faithful friend.

She had known Harry Vaughan for several years. He had joined Colonel Chester's regiment as a subaltern, when he first arrived in India, and he had been one of the few at the side of the death-bed when the gallant soldier had breathed his last.

Simple-hearted, brave and generous, he had been an universal favourite in the station, and the Colonel had treated him like a son.

Very early had Harry Vaughan lost his heart to the sweet pansy eyed Beryl, but as time passed he saw that, beyond the love of a ster, she could give him nothing in return. Still he remained faithful. She was more than life to him, and he was content to worship her from afar rather than lose his idol

It was a sad blow to him when the Colonel died, and she left for England; but he plodded steadily on, patiently waiting for the next twelve months to pass, at the end of which time he would be entitled to a long furlough, and then he would be able once more to see

Yes, he would make the journey of seven thousand miles for the pleasure of beholding and speaking to the one he loved, knowing that he could expect nothing more.

And now that he was seated by her side, with none others present, he felt that a greater distance than ever divided them.

CHAPTER IV.

WHEN the Honourable Bertie Wilmot had WHEN the Honourable Bertie Wilmot had seen Beryl safely ensonneed in her cab he turned on his heel, and hailing the next one that passed, bade the man drive him to the Junior Army and Navy Club.

He was anything but easy in his mind. His pecuniary difficulties had reached that acute stage when they must be fairly faced.

The winning of the Derby by The Duke had upset all his calculations, and it had been only with the greatest difficulty that he had too glad to marry me, and I am not bound by managed to raise the money to pay off his any promise to Flora."

He arose from his seat, and crossed over to debts of honour.

Other creditors there were, many of them, and most of these must be satisfied almost immediately.

He opened the trap and bade the man drive him to his chambers in Down-street, Picca-

"It is useless putting the thing off any longer," he muttered beneath his moustache. "I had better face it once for all. Of course, I must sell out, and then see what Basingstoke will plank down with his sister. Lady Flora has style and beauty and all that sort of thing and with a good sinecure we might rub along pretty comfortably."

His brow became contracted, and he stroked his abia the problem.

His brow became contracted, and he stroked his chin thoughtfully.

"No; I cannot lose little Beryl; but she must know that marriage is cut of the question. That will soon be settled. I daresay she will make a pretty little resistance, but love will overcome all that, and then, beyond a feeble reproval or two, I shall hear nothing further of it. I hope she won't let Lady Flora into the secret, though. I should scarcely care to face that young lady in a passion."

The hansom stopping at twenty-seven put an end to his soliloquy, and he ascended to his chambers with a light step. His servant was at the door to receive

"Well, Sam, any news?"
"No, sir, but plenty of callers," replied
Sam, with a military salute.
"So I suppose. Of course you told them you did not know where I was?"

"I hope I obeyed your orders, sir."
"That is right. Now let me have my letters." "Lady Herrington has been here three times to make inquiries."

Wilmot gave a satisfied smile.

She could have heard nothing of his clandestine meetings with her companion.

"Anyone else particular?"

Note the transfer of the principle of the clandestine meetings with her companion.

"No, sir. The Earl of Basingstoke, Lord Arbuthnot, Sir Charles—"

"That will do; my letters."
"Yes, sir. I looked 'em up in the safe, sir, for safety. I'll go and fetch 'em at once, sir. Mr. Evans, the Armyagent, has been here, sir; he said as 'ow he thought you might want to make a change or "" make a change, or ——"

"It's like his infernal impudence. Never mind him, Sam; let me have the letters."

mind him, Sam; let me have the letters."

"Yes, sir."
Sam hastily disappeared, and throwing himself into a luxurious chair, the gallant Captain picked up the Evening Standard, and glanced casually over the outer page.

The first thing that attracted his attention was an advertisement in the "agony" column.

He gave a short, quick ejaculation of surprise, and then read the advertisement through.

through.

It was only one of many that appear every day, but the name attracted his attention.

It ran as follows,

"CHESTER.—If Miss Beryl Chester, daughter of the late Colonel Chester, who died at Ressalgunge, in the North-West Provinces of India, will communicate with Messre. Snapper, Best, and Co., 95, Gray's Inn-square, she will hear of something greatly to her advantage."

He read this advertisement through twice before Sam returned with the letters. "They must wait," he said impatiently.

"Give me me a brandy and sods, Sam, and then leave me."

The servant silently obeyed, and Bertie Wilmot was left alone with his own

"I would give a pony to know the meaning of this," he said, tapping the advertisement impatiently. "Who knows but this may be a fortune awaiting her, and if it is—if it is, why should I not have it? She would only be tell her nothing of this matter until after the his desk.

"I will write to Evans; or stay, a telegram might find him to-night, and we shall lose no

Taking up his hat he walked to his club, wrote the telegram and sent it off; then he sat down in a quiet corner of the dining-room and partook of a light dinner.

"I shall have just time to stroll back," he said, as he lighted a fragrant Havannah.

When he reached his chambers Evans had not arrived, but half-an-hour later the suave not arrived, but half-an-hour later the suave agent made his appearance.

"Good evening, Captain Wilmot, I received your telegram and came at once. You wish to sell or exchange?"

"Neither," replied Wilmot, stiffly. "I want you to do me a service."

"With the greatest pleasure in the world, my dear sir. What is it?"

Bertie produced the Evening Standard.

"I want you to make inquiries concerning

"I want you to make inquiries concerning this. I think I know the lady to whom it refers. By to-morrow afternoon I must know all concerning it."

Mr. Evans fixed his sharp, ounning eyes full

Mr. Evans axed his snarp, onning eyes in upon the guardsman's face.

"I think I understand," he said, slowly.

"What the deuce do you mean?"

"Nothing, Captain, nothing, only that I understand what you wish me to do."

Shortly after noon the next day Mr. Evans entered with a beaming face.

"Well?" evans Cartin, Wilmot, impac-

"Well?" asked Captain Wilmot, impa-

"Well?" assets the young tiently.
"If you have any interest in the young lady you are a lucky man," exclaimed Evans, rubbing his hands together vigorously. "She is a great heiress!"
"An heiress!"
"You an uncle of hers has died, leaving her over two hundred thousand pounds in consols, and as much in railway stocks."

Wilmot fairly sprang from his seat.
"Is this true?" he said excitedly.

"True as gospel, Captain; but she has only a life interest."

The guardsman's face fell.
"You could insure her life, Captain," suggested the agent. "But who gets the reversion?"

"All the property comes to her children if she has any; if not, it reverts to the Crowa." "Four hundred thousand pounds, that "Nearly fitteen thousand a year, Captain.

A very nice income indeed."
"You are right, Evans. Could you let me have a few hundreds for two or three months?"

"On what security, Captain?"
"My paper."
The agent shook his head.

"I could let you have as much as you liked if Miss Chester's signature was across

The guardsman turned pale.
"What do you take me for?" he demanded,

The other shrugged his shoulders.
"The labourer is worthy of his hire, Captain. If you help her to thousands I don't see why she should not assist you to hundreds!"

Still Wilmot hesitated.

"No, no," he said, half aloud. "It might spoil all."

The cunning eyes of the agent glistened.
His surmise was correct.
The Honourable Bertie Wilmot not only knew this heiress, but would probably marry

This knowledge was sufficient to ensure to Bertie the amount he might require at some

M

be

Po

in 81 es M

m pe w di in re di la

08 hen event takes place. She might think I was marrying her money, not her."

He took up the cheque left by Evans, and placing it in his breass pocket, strolled towards the bank with a lighter heart than he had known for many a day.

First dropping into the club for luncheon, he then made the best of his way to the rendezvous at Regent's Park.

Beryl had not arrived, so, lighting a cigar, he strolled carelessly up and down the avenue.

Half an hour passed, and she had not come; then an hour, which was precently increased to two; but still she never made her appear-

"Strange! "he muttered. "Flora is detaining her. I must call there at once. Per-

He turned sick at the very thought.

If she were to die all his chateau d'Espagne would vanish into thin air.

He rang the bell violently at Lord Basingstoke's maneion. "Is Miss Ches-

-" he began, and then corrected himself,-

"Is the Earl at home?"

No; the Earl was not, but Lady Flora would be pleased to see Captain Wilmot.

The Captain would willingly have avoided the tete d tote, but he know not how to do so. Besides, he was more than anxious to hear something of Beryl,

Lady Flora met him with a gracious smile. "Quite a stranger, I declare! We thought we had lost you, Captain."

He murmured something about business in the North.

"In the North-west, I suppose?" she asked. maliciously. "At least, I thought you would have bidden us good-bye."

was in great hasto; but had I known I should be missed by one of the fairest of her sex I should certainly have come. I hope I have atoned for my neglect by not losing a moment upon my return?"

But you were in London yesterday! "Yo-os," he said, turning very red in the

"This will never do," he thought. " Lady Flora is evidently bent upon a declaration. wish Basingstoke would make his appearance. How is the charming Miss Chester?" he asked, plunging abraptly into the subject that had brought him to the square.

"Captain Wilmot, I do not wish that person's name mentioned in my hearing again," she said, haughtily. "I learnt all yesterday, and I turned her out of the house

"Gane !" he oried, despairingly.

"I hope your heart will not break?" she said, with a sneer.

He uttered a forced laugh.
"Not very likely, Lady Flora," he said. with a desperate effort at composure; "but I must not trespass on your time further to-day. I have an appointment, and I dine at the mess. May I have a cup of tea to morrow

"You really do not deserve it!" she said, playfully; "but I suppose I must promise."
Glad to escape on any terms, he was passing through the door when a cabman came up with a note in his hand.

"I've come for the luggidge of Miss Chester of Kilburn. Here's her 'thority; the sez an there's two trunks and a bonnet hox."

"There the things are—take 'em!" said the porter, superciliossly. "We don't want

Luck seemed to be favouring the young guardsman with a vengeance.

He stood at a little distance and patiently waited until the man had placed the luggage on the top of the cab, and himself on the

Then as he was turning his horse he beckoned to him.

"Drive me to where you are taking the luggage and you shall have this."

held up a sovereign, and the man

"It's agin orders, sir," he murmured.
"Very well. I can follow you in another vehicle.

"So you could, sir. But I'll tell yer wha I'll do. If you'll get out at the corner of the street and follow on foot I'll drive slow."

The cabman stopped at the corner of a short ultra respectable looking atreet, and Bertie alighted.

As he looked at the two long lines of bay windowed cottages, each exactly like its neighbours, with glaring green venetian blinds, common net cartains, and plants or ante-diluvian work-boxes or tea-caddies in the windows, he absolutely shuddered.

"It is like a horrible nightmare," he muttered, stroking his heavy moustache. "One deserves something in return for inflicting this upon oneself."

He kept his gaze fixed upon the house before the door of which the cab had stopped, until he saw the driver scrambling upon the box.

Then he crossed ever and addressed the homely looking woman who, with paraffin lamp in hand, was about to close the door. "Miss Ghester is in, I hope. In the parlour is she? Thank you.'

Before a reply could be youchsafed he had pushed past her and laid his hand upon the Giving a premonitory rap he entered. A common reading lamp with a green p shade showed a dim light, but by its aid he easily recognised Beryl, very pale and wan, lying on the hard, horsehair couch.

Thinking it was the landlady she lay fectly still, with her eyes partly closed, and her small delicate hands clasped across her bosom.

"Beryl!" he oried; "my darling."
She sprang to her feet, and he held out his hands, but she shrank back into the farthest corner of the room.

"How could you act thus?" he asked, in an injured and mournful tone. "My heart is almost broken."

Her bosom rose and fell tumultuously, and stretching out her hand she pointed to the

She could only utter one word, and that came from her very soul,-

"Beryl, are you ill or mad? You bid me go my death. Without you I could never to my death,

She gave him a look of scorn.

"Go, to your promised bride," she repeated sternly.

"You are my promised bride, my precious one, nor do I want other. My darling, what have I done to deserve this? During the whole of this day have I been making pre-whole of this day have I been making pre-parations for our nuptials. Why this mute change? Have you already regretted the words you uttered twenty-four hours ago?"

"Yes, yes, a thousand times yes. I did not then know you were engaged to be married to Lady Flora Herrington. What had I done, Captain Wilmot, that you should think! I would consent to be the toy of your idle hours?" she demanded, unconsciously repeat-ing the world of Lady Flora. ing the words of Lady Flora.

Bertie Wilmot dropped upon one knee

"By heavens, you do me wrong, Beryll" he said solemnly, "I never was engaged to be married to Lady Flora, I mean it. We are be married to Lady Flora, I mean it. We are old friends, but nothing more. Will you not believe me, my true, my only love?"

She looked down into his handsome face, and felt her resolution waning.
"Lady Flora said so herself," she murmured.

Wilmot muttered an oath beneath his

"It is false! Baryl, how could you be-lieve it true? You are the only woman I ever loved sincerely; you are the only one I ever asked to be my wife!"

A shrill of exultation flowed through her frame. She had not been deceived after all;

A great weight seemed lifted off her mind.

and sinking down upon the couch she sough relief in a flood of tears.

A look of triumph flashed from his eye: "You trust me, you love me, Beryl? will be my wife?"
"I will," she said, solemnly.

He took her in his arms and imprinted a passionate kiss pron her hot wet ch

"Heaven bless you, my Beryl !" he said. with rather an awkward attempt at solemnity: but she never noticed his awkwardness.

She was happy, and in her happiness not at all inclined to be hypercritical.

As they sat side by side upon the couch, he conjuring up for her dreams of future happi-ness and blies, and she listening in raps at-tention to his well-chosen and delusive words, there came another rap at the door, and Mrs. Benson, the landlady, entered with a scared look on her face.

" Beg pardon, miss, but the other gentleman as was here yesterday, he wants to know here you are, and if he may see you for a moment?"

Bertie's face flashed. She had told him she knew no one in London, and yet here was a masculine acquaintance anxiously inquiring after her welfare. Was he not after all, to be allowed to carry off this rich prize without a

"Yes, Mrs. Bonsor, tell him to come in," she said, with a weary smile at her lover's flushed face. "It is a very old friend, one of the best, kindest, dearest souls that ever lived. He did all his soldiering at Ressalgange."

Before she could explain further Harry Vaughan entered the room.

She ran to meet him.

"Why, Beryl, you look as bright and happy as ever l" he oried, delightedly grasp-ing her hands. "What magic has been at work?

"Captain Wilmot, of the Guards; Major Vaughan, of the 18th Bengal Infantry."

The two men saluted each other ceremoniously, and at the very moment their hands met, in what should have been a grasp of friendship, they knew they hated each other with an unquenchable hatred.

"I do hope you will be happy, Beryl," said poor Harry the day before the marriage; but this Wilmot's character?"

She placed her tiny hand over his lips.

"I cannot hear you say anything about him, Harry," she said, pleadingly.

Harry Yarghan shook his head, and sighed.
"Parhaps you are right, Beryl; but I wish there was someone else to take her father's place than me to-morrow," he added, in an andestrone. undertone.

And so the marriage was finally arranged; and on this bright, sunny morning in early June, Beryl Chester and Bertis Wilmot stood side by side in the little church at Hamp-stead, and repeated the words that were to bind them together for life.

Scarcely had the words been pronounced that made them one when the bright shy became overcast; load ramblings of thunder was heard, the lightning flashed, and then the rain came down in torrents.

" Is it an omen?" thought Harry Vaughan, moodily. "I know not why, but I sorely mistrust this drawling aristocrat."

That night, whilst the bride and bride groom were speading across the Channel, en route for Paris, Harry Vaughan was sisting up writing several important letters.

One was to the India Office, resigning his

"I cannot return to India and leave her entirely alone to the mercy of that man," he said, as he sealed the letter. "I have no doubt I should have gained premotion pretty quickly; but what of that if she had wanted me, and I was thousands of miles away?"

He could not sleep that night, he knew, so he determined to read until day broke, when ne could take a long walk and try to compose his thoughts.

He sook up a copy of the Times, and an e sought rinted a

he said. lemnity;

ta ton Bi ouch, he happi.

and Mrs a scared

ntleman

ow how old him nere was nquiring li, to be ithout a me in."

lover's er lived. Harry ht and y grasp.

Major

r hands rasp of 1," ssid ge; bas

sighed. I wish ather's

, in an anged; n early

t stood Hamp were to hunder en the ughan, sorely bride.

nel. en

aitting

ng his re her

VO 110 pretty vanted

OW, EO when pose

aa ba explamation of astonishment and anger broke explanation of astonishment and anger broke from his lips.

He had alighted upon the advertisement of Mesers Snapper, Best and Co.

I wonder they withat tellow should have been in such baste to marry a penniless girl? I heard he was ruined. Now all is plain. The fellow has seen this advertisement, and made inquiries. Probably, Beryl is an heiress, and the spondfeel has married her feelber more.

heiress, and the sobandrel has married her for her money."
He clenched his fist and ground his teeth,
"Why did I not see this before?" he cried.
"Will was I not sole to warn her in time?
Poor girl she will want a friend, and she shall find one in me. "Wee betide that fellow if he acts wrongly towards her; it would have been better for him had he never been born!"

CHAPTER V.

Eighteen months have passed away since he day of the marriage, and Beryl is seased in a large lounging chair on the verandah of an embanting villa which stands on the eastern coast of Sicily, a couple of miles from

Meesina.

Her robe is of a light, soft, clinging material, richly trimmed with silver and pearls; ther small, taper fingers are laden with priceless gems, and dismoude glitter and dash in her coronal of lexuriant hair and in the buckles of her tiny white satin those; round her choulders she wears a cashmere shawl, a fellow to one worn by the highest lady in England; but with all this magnificant apparel she looks very different from the quiet, joyfel girl whom we saw on Essom Downs in the Earl of Besingstoke's drag.

Her checks are pale and attenuated, she has aged many years, and signs of care and suffering are not wanting on the broad, marble-like brow.

affering are not wanting on the bread, marble-like brow.

At her feet lies the deep blue waters of the Mediterranean, reflecting in their azure depths the myriad of stars that were chining above. Away to the right rises the awe inspiring Etna, around whose orly crest there is a hoge corone of fiery red, the reflection of the terrible free raging and see thing down at its centre.

Behind her, through the partty opened shutters, comes a flood of light, and the sounds of load voices and laughter, mixed with the rattle ofdice, and anon comes a fierce and desperate

As one deeper curse than another is borne to herears she shudders, and draws her wrap closer around her.

It is winter away in England, but here it is like summer; the air is tresh and balmy, and the heavy small of tropical flowers is borne on the western breeze.

the western breeze.

Hour after henr passes, but atill she does not move. The stars die out one by one, the deep blue sea is covered with a heavy must, the scent in the airgrows fresher and stronger, and far away behind the villa the horizon begins to be streaked with purple and red.

Morningis about to break, and the breeze that springs up is positively chilly.

With a weary cry, haft mean, half sigh, she rises to her seat, said, with a violent shiver, walks to and fro along the verandah.

Presently the words within the villa die away, then one of the windows is thrown wide open; and, with a staggering, uncertain step the Honourable Bertie Wilmot comes out upon the verandah.

His face is dushed and his eyes bloodstet, whilst his evening dress is disarranged and his bair ruffled.

"Halloa, Beryl, you here yet?" he cries.

his bair ruffled.

"Holloa, Beryl, you here yet?" he ories.
"I thought you had gone to bed long age !"
"I could not sleep it? I had done so: T preferred sixting here."

Wilmot's brow grew dark.
"I suppose you like playing the sanctimonious preacher, don't you? But I have told you before I won't have your sermons, and—I won't."

She shrank from him as though he had been a loper.

Why don't you speak? What are you looking at me in that fadition for, eh? Are you afraid I shall bite you, or that it I touch you it will contaminate you?

"I am not afraid," she replied, quietly.

The man was somewhat cowed and sobered by the gentle dignity of this outraged woman. Moreover, he had use for her at the present moment, and it would not be prudent for him to act with violence.

"Don't let us quarrel, Beryl," he said, "I am miserable enough, Heaven only knows. I have lost over forty thousand pounds this

She uttered a cry of horror and astonishment.

"Forty thousand pounds! You can never pay such an amount. You have already spent nearly one hundred thousand this year!"

"I cannot help luck going dead against me, and favouring the Count Villari and the Ohevalier de St. Croix, can I? Had not that uncle of yours made such a foolish will we would have got the money without difficulty."

"Are you not ashamed to speak of him to whom we over everything in such a manner?"

she asked.

He was an oldfool!" he retorted, savagely; "He was an oldfool?" he retorted, savagely;
"but step inside for a minute, it is deueed cold out here. Forsyth says the can let me have the money on my bill."

"It is very kind of Sir Charles Forsyth, seeing he has already won more than that of you during his stay here as your gaest," she

"Don't be an idiot. There is the bill, now sign it. We can arrange about the insurance by telegraph."

He placed the stamped paper before her and the pen in her hand.

A strange, fixed look of determination shone in her eyes.

"I shall not sign it," she said, firmly.
"Not sign it?" he cried, with a laugh.
"You sign it?" he cried, with a laugh.
"You are my wife, and will do as I bid you."

He took up a slight riding whip that lay upon one of the couches and twisted it mervously between his fingere.

"Oome, come, don't be a fool, Beryl; you must sign it, or I shall be disgreed for

She took up the bill and tore it into a hundred pieces.

"That is my reply," she said, firmly. "I will no longar be a party to this gambling and wickedness."

A cruel gleam shone in his eyes. He raised the whip, it quivered in the air a moment, and then fell upon her pure, beautiful cheek, leaving a long bar of red quivering flesh across it.
She attered but one word, and that she hurled at him with all the vebemence of her outraged spirit,-

"Coward!"

The word stung his soul worse than the whip lash had her tender cheek, for he knew he deserved the opprobious spithet.

With a vile, fierce outh he left the room, and Beryl and back upon the couch, her brain seething and boiling with a fiercer fire than that which raged in the centre of Etna

CHAPTER VI.

A raw hours later she had recovered her composure, and was seated in a small chamber composere, and was seated in a small chamber facing the south.

The sun was pouring a flood of golden light into the room, and seemed to cast a radiant halo around her slight, slender figure, as she sat in a large, low-seated, orlusion velvet chair, clad in a loose, flowing robe of white cashmere. One check—the check that bore the evidence of her treacherous husband's distardly cowaddee—rested upon her telicate hand, and her long, dark lashes shaded her large and glorious oyes. eyes.

Suddenly she gave a slight start as she heard a firm, manly footstep on the verandah without, and a rich, hectic glow suffased her

The next moment Harry Vaughan, with a

The next moment Harry Vaugnar, with a grave look on his face, entered.

"Beryl," he said, quietly taking both her hands in his, "I thank you for having kept your promise. When I first discovered that he knew of your legacy before your marriage I followed you, and made you promise that if ever you were in trouble you would send for, and confide in me. You have done so, and I thank you for your trust."

thank you for your trust."

She looked at him with a wan, feeble attempt at a smile.

"I fear I have scarcely kept my promise to the letter," she said, quietly, "for I have been in trouble ever since this ill fated ring encircled my finger."

She drew from her bosom her wedding ring, which she had taken off five minutes after which she had based of his minutes after receiving the blow.

"Now the climax has arrived, and I ask your advice and counsel as the only friend I possess in the world."

Then, in a cold, hard, restrained voice, that pained him far more than the wildest emo-tion could have done, she told him of what had occurred that morning.

The strong man's frame quivered as he listened, and he rocked to and fro as though listened, and he rocked to and fro as though he would fail.

"And he did this?" he asked, fisrcely.

"Harry, for Heaven's take, for my sake, for the take of the friendship you bore my father, centrol yourself!"

"Baryl, my angel!" he oried, in the guet of passion with which he was overpowered, forgetting his habitual reserve. "He shall pay for that blow with his life!"

Baryl said her hand sently upon his arm.

pay for that blow with his life!"

Beryl laid her hand gently upon his arm.

"Is this noble? Is this generous?" she oried. "Be true to yourself and me! I sent to ask your advice as to the course I should pursue, and you lose control over yourself! Harry Vaughan, bad as he is, you must not leaget he is my husband. Promise me, on your word of honour, you will not risk a quarrel with him? Promise me?" she repeated, "for I know you would never break your word."

A flerce struggle took place in his breast.

"A fierce struggle took place in his breast.

"I promise," he said, hushily, "on one condition. I must make the condition, Beryl," he "added, apologetically. "You must leave this treacherous coward—leave him for ever."

"He is my husband," she meaned. "I dare not—I cannot !"

"He is my nussand," she meaned. "I dare not—I cannot!"
"She leaned back, a sickly pallor overspreading her face, for the suddenly realised the trath—that she was married to one man, and loved another.

She now knew too well that her whole heart belonged to the self-sacrificing, devoted man before her, and her pure mind was affrighted before her, and her pure mind was affrighted at its own discovery.

Nover guessing the cause of her sudden faintness, 'Harry Yangban senk upon his knees at her feet; and clasped her hand.

"Beryl, I conjure you by all you hold sacred to leave this man at once!" he cried.

"He is raterly unworthy of you. You asked my advice; you have it. I cannot live, knowing what he has done, and leave you with him.

The form him as you would from a plague or Fly from him as you would from a plague, or

At that moment the door was flung open, and with his features contorted by passion, Bertie Wilmot strode into the reom.

"What is the meaning of this pretty scene?" he demanded, fiercally.

Harry Vanghan sprang to his feet.

"It means, Captain Wilmer, that you are a scoundrel!" he said, half choking with passion.

"Harry, Harry, do not break your word," pleaded Baryl, extnessly.
"For your take I will not," he replied, softly.

Wilmot foamed at the mouth with rage and

Apr

only be her bel Sacl

now th

degrad

was proould watch

carefu

All

the ev

Byfor

gaudy could ap to

SWAR

die in and

No

vere. inter

oh. I to s does fort musible A sha insi yell fact wor The and light no

ap

no hs

ar

ar hi

80 day "a

As

Then he turned to his wife.

And so," he said with a bitter gneer. "this is your piety, this is your religion, you shameless creature ! "

"You ---," burst out Harry, but he was checked by the pleading look of the injured

"I can explain it all, sir," said Beryl, with mposed dignity. "Your insults I am used composed dignity. "Your insults I am used to, and one word more or less can make but little difference; but for my own honour and its gentleman I must explain."

"Proceed, madam," said Wilmot, the evil light in his eyes increasing each moment. "Proceed!"

"As you are aware, Major Vaughan was a close and faithful friend of my father."

And now the friend of the father is a lover of the daughter? What a pity that the daughter is a wife, or perhaps that is rather an advantage in the eyes of such a high-minded couple."

Harry felt felt as though he could kill him where he stood, whilst Beryl's face, neck, and bosom became suffused with a rich carmation.

"That your vile suspicions are entirely unfounded you well know, sir," she replied, her proud spirit rising to her aid.

"Unfounded, are they? I am glad you think so, for no one clee will when they hear of the scene I was myself a witness to; but pray go on, madam, with your story. I am an attentive listener."

"Sir," said Harry, hotly. "Nay, Beryl, I shall speak. Sir, I will tell you the meaning of the scene you saw. I had learnt of your dastardly cowardice to this fragile flower, and I was pleading to her, for her own sake and that of her dead father, to leave this house, to fly from here."

"With you?" asked Wilmot, contemptu-

"Goad me not too far, sir," said Harry, the veins on his temples standing out like knotted cords. "I have promised not to seek a quarrel with you."

Very kind of you, I am sure, but seeing I am the injured party I can scarcely see why I should be grateful."

Then he turned once again to his wife, bending upon her a truly demoniscal glare.

Leave the room, wanton," he cried,

"Leave the room, wanton," he cried, hoarsely; "I will settle accounts with your paramour alone."

Harry's passion was now beyond all control. "Scoundrel!" he cried, hoarsely. "You are a cowardly liar. That fair child is as pure as the Heaven above us!

Wilmot's face turned of an ashen hue, and his hand mechanically sought his breast.
"None shall call me that and live," he

At the same time he drew out a revolver and pointed it at Vaughan's head.

The latter had been in many a ekirmish with the wild hill tribes of India, and his experience now stood him in good stead. Quick as lightning he dashed forward and seized the hand of the desperate man.

A terrible struggle—a struggle for life and death-ensued; the men's breath came in fit-ful gasps, and each strained his nerves and muscles until it seemed they must break from the tension.

"You shall die!" hissed Wilmot, making a final attempt to release himself from the wice like grasp.

Then there came a loud report, and the two fell headlong to the ground.

In speechless terror Beryl gazed at the cloud of blue smoke that enveloped the combatants.

A puff of air came through the casement, and, the cloud gently lifting, she saw Harry Vaughan rising slowly from the ground, upon which Wilmot lay perfectly motionless.

Hazry Vaughan was at her side in an instant, and as the servants and visitors rushed pell-mell into the room, he was raising her head as gently as though she had been but

She was at once taken to her bed-room, but for the whole of that day and the next she never moved or spoke; the only sign of life being her gentle, fitful breathing.

Towards midnight her speech and power of motion returned, and then, wish many a foreboding shake of the head, the local doctor pronounced her to be suffering from a severe explain."

If you're like the rest of your family. attack of brain fever.

The fascinating Bertie Wilmot never spoke

The bullet that he had intended for Vaughan had penetrated his own breast, and lodged in his heart, causing instantaneous death. An inquiry, of course, was held, but it was merely as a matter of form, for, even in death, the pistol was still clenched in the white, shapely hand.

For months and months Beryl lay on the threshold of the next world; but her youth finally conquered, and the grim skeleton, Death, was forced to forego his anticipated triumph.

During her illness, Harry Vaughan was most assiduous in his attentions, and spent more than half his time at the Villa Villieri; and when at last the eminent London physician, whom he had brought over, pronounced the turn for the better to have taken place, the strong man fairly broke down, and cried like

Some two years after this a quiet, simple wedding took place in a quaint, ivy-olad church in Sassex

The bridegroom was Harry Vaughan, and the bride was Beryl, no more sad and pensive, but with a bright, glad smile upon her pure,

As they left the church she clung closely to his arm, and looked up into his manly face confidingly. "She murmured, "I have found a safe haven of refuge. With this strong arm to protect me, I need fear neither storm nor

"No, darling mine!" he said, leaning down and looking into her blushing face with honest, love lit syes. "Never more, whilst I live, shall you be Tempest-Tossed!"

At that moment the bells clanged forth their joyful greeting; the villagers, who had known and loved Henry Vanghan ("our Master Henry," as they delighted to call him) since he was a boy, raised a mighty huzzah, and, amidst the good wishes of all who saw their happy faces, Beryl and her husband drove off, to enter a new and lovelier life.

THE END.

NOVELETTE .- continued.]

POOR LITTLE VAL.

-:0:-

CHAPTER V .- (continued.)

In a few minutes Mrs. Byford entered the room, and, having heard of Val's arrival, demanded sharply,—

"Who is this girl, Cecil, and what does she want?"

She spoke in a thick, guttural voice, and her manner was coarse in the extreme; but the feeble, pitiable creature beside the fire answered, soothingly.—

"She is my grandchild, my dear, Laura's daughter, and she wishes to reside with us."

"So you are that good-for-nothing woman's daughter, are you? Well, what do you want with us?" Where are your fine friends? And, let me tall you, we have nothing to spare to beggara. But for me, he would be homeless," and she pointed contemptuously to her husband. "You can't live on a title, can you? I never should have married him but for his lies. He told me he would introduce me to society—he! The poor wretch who can't call a penny his own—and I was such a fool I believed him."

During this harangue Cecil Byford sat downcast and deprecatory, whilst Val shrank made no further expostulation or entreary; let me tell you, we have nothing to spare to beggars. But for me, he would be homeless,"

"What can you do?" she asked.
"I don't understand you," said Valentins, shrinking further into her corner. "Please explain."

"You're like the rest of your family-a precious idiot," retorted the lady. "Can you sing and play, do you know French, and all that sort of rubbish?"

"I-I can play, and draw a little, Of course I speak French and German, because I al.

ways lived abroad with papa."
"Well, look here, I'm not a hard woman, but I can't afford to keep any girl in idlenes; so if you like to teach my niece (she's my ward, too) you may, if not, you'll have to go.
"I will stay, if you please," Val answerd tremulously. "Is your niece very far ad tremulously. "Is your nices very far advanced in her studies?"

"Not she! and she's only ten, so you ough!

to manage presty well. Come upstairs with me, and I'll show you where you can sleep for to-night," and she whisked Val off to a small room furnished with two beds, a washstand and a chair. "I don't go in for high art," she said, with an odious laugh, "it's a waste of said, with an odious laugh, "It's a waste of money. Lydia! Where are you? Lydia!" In answer to her call a child appeared, who bore so marked a likeness to Mrs. Byford that she might have passed for her own daughter. "This is Miss Dalton, and she will be your governess. Learn all you can; her time is yours. You needn't change your dress, Miss yours. Too heads to take your areas, and she went away, accompanied by Lydis, who gave poor Val a parting scowl.

She was left to find her way to the dining room, where the meagreness of the fare contracted discarded with the coulty place. How trasted strangely with the coatly plate. Hungry as she was, Val could not eat, and, as no wine was forthcoming, she fared badly in deed.

She was heartily glad when Mrs. Byford sold her she could go to her room, only her gladness was much tempered when she learned Lydia cocupied the second bed. The household rose early, and after a hasty and uncomfortable breakfast Valentine was escorted to the schoolroom, a bare and dirty apartment. Timidly she began her duties, conscious that to Lydia she was an object of derision. The child was bent upon annoying her, and succeeded so well that in a sudden access of wild despair poor Val broke into a wild flood of tears. Lydia regarded her with astonishment a moment, then pushing books and slate aside, coolly and deliberately left the room.

Val fled to her own apartment, only to stand transfixed at the door. Then indignation got the better of fear, and running forward she seized Mrs. Byford by the arm orying, "You wicked woman! how dare you, how dare of Val's belongings.

The other turned calmly from her inspection

"Please to remember I am mistress here, Miss Dalton, and that I have a perfect right to examine your tranks if I choose. If you object you have your remedy. You can return to the friends who are weary of you

Val stood white and allent, her eyes clouded by anguish and fear of this woman, who lift-ing out a casket took from it Val's favourite

rls, and saying. "These are too incongruous for one in your position," proceeded to try the effect against her own hair.

"Oh, not those ! not those!" cried the girl.

u pon the alentine, amily-a Can onree 10

ise I al.

dleness; she's my e to go.

u ought irs with sleep for a small art." she waste of ydia!" ord that aghter. e your time is y here,

diningare con-Hunadly in-

Byford

nly her learned lentine are and

WAS AD

hat in a l broke

ded her gaiden erately

o stand

" You w dare

pection

If you of you londed no liftrourite

gainst

ne girl. seal to suffer

e, but tes my self to nt she testy;

only busied herself mechanically in restoring her belongings to order.

Such a new and terrible life began for her now that at times she feared the misery and degradation of it would drive her mad. She was penniless and alone in an evil house; and could not even send a line to her friends, being watched closely, and all her correspondence earefully overlooked.

All the morning she worked with Lydia, in the afternoon she read to her grandfather, and the evenings were spent in playing for Mrs. Byford's edification, or in repairing that lady's guady, but scanty wardrobe.

There was scarcely a minute of the day she could call her own; and when at last she crept to her room, it was to her movements.

ould call her own; and when at last she crept up to her room, it was to find Lydia wide awake, and very curious as to her movements.

A great dread fell upon her lest she should die in this house, so lonely, so God-forsaken; and her natural timidity was so increased that she scarcely dared venture down the long corridors, or through the silent rooms alone.

No lotters reached her from Eric or Guinevers, and Val suspected that some had been intercepted, and cried in her sick heart. What must they, what can they believe of me? They think I am false and forgetful. Oh, Eric loh, my friend! how sorely I need your help. So a month crept wearily by, and then one day Mrs. Byford announced that Mr. Levi, "a rich cousin of mine," would dine with them, and added she had prevailed upon him to spend a few weeks with them.

"He is very rich," she remarked, boastfully, "and much respected in the city, and if he does not marry, Lydia will come into a great fortune when he dies. Miss Dalton, you must make my red velvet look as well as possible."

All the afternoon Val sat working at the sible."

All the afternoon Val sat working at the habby red velveteen, which Mrs. Byford insisted should be trimmed lavishly with yellow Nottingham lace; and had the satisfaction of knowing that her own ornaments would adorn the other's head and throat. Then she went to her room to make a hasty and careless toilet.

Mr. Levi arrived in due time, and, dinner being announced. Val slowly descended, and slipped into her place, hoping she had not been noticed.

But Mr. Lavi's quick aves turned instanting

But Mr. Levi's quick eyes turned instantly

But Mr. Levi's quick eyes turned instantly apon her.
"How do you do, Miss Dalton?" he asked, not waiting for an introduction. "Rebecca has been speaking of you, so that you don't seem like a stranger to me."
He spoke abruptly, but the voice was not unpleasant, the face not unfriendly, and Val answered as best she could; then he devoted himself to his dinner, and she was left undisturbed until the gentlemen joined them in the drawing room.

Then Mrs. Byford bade her sing, and Mr. Levi, who was passionately fond of music, drew nearer, listening eagerly as the tremulous voice gradually grew firmer, rising and falling in mellow cadenoes.

When the song ended he said, "Thank you immensely, Miss Dalton; you sing well. I had no idea Rebecca harboured a nightingale."

"Do not spoil her by flattery," his cousin broke in; "ahe is capricious enough as it is."
"I never flatter, Rebecca," he answered, coldly, and she subsided into silence, standing not a little in awe of Mr. Levi; and he begged for another song. He was so kind in speech and looks that Val was glad to serve him, even in so small a thing; and the evening were away more pleasantly than usual.

Mr. Levi was a power in the house, and did not scruple frankly to condemn his cousin's management or miserly way; and although she botly resented this she bore it in silence.

"Nathan is dreadful in a rage," she said to Val. "It takes a great deal to rouse him, but once roused, it is hard work to soothe him. I believe he never forgets or forgives an ofence."

ford looked on angrily, afraid that "Nathan would make a fool of himself for that pale-faced chit."

He had begun by pitying the poor child; but day after day, watching her sweet unselfishness, her meek submission to her most unhappy lot, pity deepened into something warmer and fonder. He had gone through forty years without experiencing a warmer sentiment for any woman than friendship, and as Rebecca would say, "When he took the plague it would be badly." Val was distinctly not his ideal, and yet he loved her, suddenly, violently, unreasonably.

One morning when they sat at breakfast, Mrs. Byford sorting her letters, he saw Val's eyes watching her wistfully, and finally she asked,—

"Is there not one for me?"

"Is there not one for me?"

"No. Does anyone ever trouble to write to you?" and she was about to transfer one to her pooket when Mr. Levi put out his hand, and quietly wresting it from her, said hand, and the color, and the color, intercepted thus?"

She was furious, and his calmness irritated her the more. How dare he so wantonly insult her before that girl! Had she not a right to end a correspondence which would do more harm than good? And if she generously gave Miss Dalton shelter and food she considered she had a perfect right to act as she pleased with regard to her and her belongings.

The may's eyes flashed cominously but he pleased with regard to her and her belongings. The man's eyes flashed ominously, but he did not lose his calmness, as taking Rebecca by the hand, he led her to the door.

"It would be as well if you retired to your room for awhile," he said. "Do not degrade yourself further in my eyes," and without a word she went. He turned smilingly to Val. "Really, I ought to have married Rebecca," he remarked. "I am the only person of whom she stands in awe. Is your letter what you expected?"

you expected?"

"I have not opened it yet, but it comes from a friend—my dearest friend."

"And you are anxious to master the con-tents? Pray, don't mind me, I have my paper," and using it as a screen he left her free to read Erio's words.

"My DEAR LITTLE VAL -Until now I have not ventured to write you a single line, knowing that I have wronged you deeply, although Heaven sees, unintentionally; but when my mother's and Guinevere's appeals remain unnoticed I must pluck up courage to send you a few lines. Dear, we are all most anxious concerning you, and the house is wretched without you. Won't you come back to us and make us happy? Or is my sin so great you cannot forgive? Tell me frankly, dear little Val. I deserve that you should be angry, but you must not include my mother in that anger. not ventured to write you a single line, know-anger.

"Are they kind to you in your new home? Are you happy? You leave us a prey to so many doubts by your silence. I am afraid for you, little woman; and remembering my promise to your dead father, cannot think myself absolved from all duty towards you, despite our altered relations. Unless you write, and quickly, I shall come to you, and bring you back to the home which is no home without you. My mother bids me convey her dearest love to you, and I, myself, would have you remember how dear you must always be to your brother.

"ERG." to your brother.

And when she had read all these kind words, the tears which had slowly risen to her eyes rained down her cheeks. She rested her arms upon the table, and burying her face upon them, sobbed for very thankfulness. Startled and dismayed, Mr. Levi moved to more fond than I deserve or hoped. It is their kindness smites me so. My heart aches with its burden of gratitude and love."

with its burden of gratitude and love."

She was trembling very much, and he laid one hand protectingly upon her shoulder.

"Try to be calm," he said, gently. "Any violent emotion is bad for you now; you are so frail and nervous. Val, won't you tell me what I can do for you? Do you suppose I am blind to your sufferings, or the indignities you hourly endure? Is this the first letter you have received since you came to this wretched house?"

She bowed an affirmative, they said "I

She bowed an affirmative; then said, "I

She bowed an affirmative; then said, "I wrote twice; but received no reply, and I am quite sure my letters never left this house."

"Write again, and I will post the letter myself. You can trust me, little Val?"

"Yes, ob, yes!" gratefully. Then ahe flushed all over face and throat. "I—I have no money—not even so much as will buy paper and starms." and stamps."
Nathan Levi's face darkened. "This shall Nation Levy's face darkened. "This shall be altered; poor little could poor little soul! Val, you must let me be your banker. I shall not charge an excribitant interest," laughing. "Although we Jews have such a bad name some of us have hearts like other men. Why do you hesitate to accept so small a gift—or loan?"

loan?"

"Because I can never repay you. Mrs. Byford has appropriated all my ornaments but this," showing her ring, "and with this I could not part."

He smiled somewhat sadly.

"Write your letter, and I will take it to the post at once; but you must have money. Do not refuse, you hurt me more than you can tell!" and he thrust a handful of gold upon her. "Will you be finished in half-an-hour?"

"Yes, oh yes; and thank you for all your goodness!" With a humility which wounded him she lifted his hand and kissed it, in sign of gratitude and thanks. He snatched it hastily away, and hurried from the room, whilst poor away, and hurried from the room, whilst poor little Val wondered in what way she had offended him.

Her letter soon was written. She merely said that circumstances had prevented her re-plying before; that she was always truly grateful for all the love and care lavished upon her; that she hoped soon to hear Eric's wedding solemnised, and then—not until then—would she return to the home she had so loved. They need feel no anxiety concerning her, she was well, and as happy as she could be away from them.

CHAPTER VI.

In the afternoon Nathan Levi drove Val In the afternoon Nathan Levi drove Val into the neighbouring town, where he insisted upon purchasing such articles of finery and comfort as he thought she needed. It was vain to remonstrate with him, he only laughed "My age gives me privileges. I have so much to be grateful for !" "But I have no claim upon you!"

"But I have no claim upon you!"

"You have the claim every weak, friendless creature has upon every man. Perhaps in my case it is greater than you imagine," with a sudden, passionate glance at the small, pale face.

The girl was not looking at him. She was sublimely unconscious of his love, and all the burden of doubts and fears he was enduring.
She was not vain enough to suppose there was anything to admire in her, that any man could desire her for his own. Once, perhaps, she might have hoped this; but Eric had taken from her whatever little vanity she ever possessed.

her eyes rained down her cheeks. She rested her arms upon the table, and burying her face upon them, sobbed for very thankfulness.

Nathan is dreadful in a rage," she said to Val. "It takes a great deal to rouse him, but once roused, it is hard work to soothe him. I believe he never forgets or forgives an offence."

However that might be, he continued his kindly manner towards Val, whilst Mrs. By.

The drive was pleasant, though cold, and the properties of the rarms upon the table, and burying her face upon them, sobbed for very thankfulness.

Startled and dismayed, Mr. Levi moved to but on their return journey, great masses of black clouds gathered rapidly, and presently the rain fell in torrents.

Mr. Levi looked anxiously at his companion. "What shall I do for you?" he asked, diskindly manner towards Val, whilst Mrs. By.

Ap

Tm

eldest of the numb

dall

little migh

proce full o

of eff

88 if tion (

TH

69462

WAS T

neces

"der frogs the hum least now

In

grow beca

nos 1

rath

pe01

Dall the 828 ther a li

Ros

His SUC Dal

It i coli

rep

ma dan You ma

lan foll

you ora Cooper an Mi

8hi

will the bre

pri Mi

ws its

G by

T

are just about half-way home; but you will get horribly wet, you poor child !" "I shall do very well," she answered, shiver-ing involuntarily, " and I will change my clothes for others when I get home. Please not to trouble about me!"

But he was troubled more than he cared to show. She was so little and so weak, who could tell what this exposure meant for her? His heart ashed as his eyes rested on her pule fave, and he almost cursed himself for bringing her so far from home.

Mrs. Byford came to the ball door to meet them. "You are wet, Nathan ?" she said, carefully ignering the dripping little figure be-

"It is nothing," he answered, impatiently.
"Miss Dalton is the sufferer, not I. Go to your room at once, and when you have put on dry things come to me."

Val was glad enough to obey, being miser-ably sold, and Mr. Levi tarned into the comsitting-room where a bright fire was

"Have you may upfrish in the house, Re-becon?" he wished.

"No," she answered sullenly, " but there is some elder wine."

"Bring it me ; I shall mull some for Mies Dalton. I am very much afraid the has already taken cold."

Without a word his cousin brought him all he required, and watched his operations with sugry eyes. Presently she could keep silent no and broke out,

"Nathan, are you going to make a feel of yourself for that girl? Do you lorget the stain upon her name?"

He turned sharply upon her.
"Your first question I refuse to answer; your second must have been asked in a moment of forgof tiness. Your name was once a subject for much evil gosarp. Let Miss Dalton be; her mother's an should not shadow her whole life."

She was ellent, afraid of him ; the look in with a gesture of contempt he turned from her to his self-appointed task. Presently Val appeared paler than usual, with tired eyes and an air of lassistude. Lievi wheeled the shelbly easy chair towards the dre, and compelling her eat herself, brought her the malled wine, and hade her drink.

"You are very good to me," she said grate-lly. "I do not know how to thank you."

fully. "I do not know how to thank you." No thanks are necessary," he answered smilingly. "It is time some one looked after you, you poor child."

Mrs. Byford sniffed contemptuously, and left the room in high dudgeon. Nathan drew his chair nearer to the girl, and sat down beside her.

"You look ill, and really ought to have kept

No, no; it is so wretched up there, and so d; I would rather come down. But I am afraid I have got a violent chill; my limbrache, and my head feels beavy."

"And there is no one here to look after you,

Valentine—I may eall you by your name?— what were your friends about to let you dome to such a place as this?"

"They could not guess how bad it would be, and I have never told them. Then there were reasons—real reasons why I should leave them great teasons why I should not return unless literally compelled to do so. You will forgive me that I cannot explain."

" Keep your own secrets, Val. Tam yery

She looked gratefully at him, wondering in her humility that he should be so kind to one so unfortunute as herself; and Nathan Levi went on,-

"I have speken to your grandfather about the position you occupy here, and have tried to arouse some anxiety as to your health in his mind, but he is so completely under Rebecca's control that my efforts were use-

"And he has no affection for me." Val mid.

sadly. "He has not forgiven my poor dead mother, although, indeed, he it was who sold her to misery and sin. Every time he looks at me a seared expression comes into his eyes. He is frightened by my likeness to her, eyes. He is rightened by my immens to ner, but he his not penitent or remorseful."

"Poor child! The life here is too hard and nordid for you. Your happiness lies in escape from it, and there is even now a way open to you, but I fear you will not take it."

"Try me," eagerly. "I will do anything you advise—if you will only show me the way to live homestly. I am to stupid, and not very well educated, I am straid."

The strong man trembled as he postessed himself of one little frail hand.

"You are speaking rashly, Val. Oh! into his eyes she read his meaning there, and shrank back, frightened and distressed by the anrank back, frightened and distressed by the sudden revelation of his love.

"Oh no! nc!" she cried, "not that, Mr. Levi; please not that," and sought to hide her face from him; but he now held both hands prisoners; and kneeling before her that he might bring his face on a level with here, pleaded,- Listen to me, Val, listen! Have patience with me because of my love. It is wild and foolish perhaps, to speak of it, but I can keep silence no longer. Your wrongs and woes break down the feeble barriers I had placed between you and myself. I know I am not 'the sort of man to win a young girl's fancy, and that my race is regarded with dishible and scorn. 'Tet I venture to plead with you—because I love you."

"Oh! hush!" the entreated, in great agitation. "You do me too much honour; but but it hurts me to think you care for me so much. Oh! what shall I say to you?"

"Bay only you will not send me hopelessly away. As my wife you should be shielded from every adverse wind that blows, leved and reverenced beyond all words to tell. I would not seem to bribe you, dearest, but there is nothing you could crave that should not be yours. There are few things that I would not do to win you."

Some girls might have been tempted by the gifter of his wealth, some been touched to consent by his devotion, or glad to escape from so wretched a lot by marriage; but from so wretched a lot by marriage; but none of these considerations weighed with little Val. Her head drooped and tears filled has her voice was almost steady there yas, but her voice was almost steady when she said,—

"Indeed, indeed, I love you very much but, oh! not as you wish). I am very grateful for all your goodness, but what you ask can never be. It is hard to tell you, but I own never be. It is nate to tell you, but I owe you so much. I gave my heart long ago, wholly and for ever."

"Did he die?" Nathan asked, in a low, strained voice, "or was he untaithful to you?" Neither of these things; but I found he loved a lady so beautiful, so good, that she, and the alone, was worthy of him. And I learned, too, he would have married me out of pity for my loneliness and shame; and then and then I came away."

He held her hands faster in his own: his breath came bard and deep.—

"Vel," he pleaded, "can't you forget?
Not just now, but in a little white, when the ache has grown less?

"I shall never forget," she answered, simply, "My love will only die with me." He sighed deeply; it was hard that love should come to him so late, and be in vain. "My dearest!" he arged, "my dearest, let us forget your words. Give me the right to protect and care for you, and I will be centent simply to have and hold you mine. Do not send me away. Remember you are all in all to me, and be kind."

(To be concluded in our next.)

A "good man gone wrong," is usually a bad

FACETIE.

"Are you a great of this house?" asked the clark at the cigar stand of a travelling man. "A what?" "A great." "Oh, no; not at all. I am simply permitted to live here—tolerated at the rate of a pound per day."

"I sax, Bromley," said Damley, "do you believe there is such a person in existence at the fool-killer?" "Let me suc, Dumley, replied Bromley. "About hew old are yet?"
"I'm gettin' on toward fifty." "No." replied Bromley, "I'don't believe there is."

Mass Rossion (at the theatre): " Note the precision with which that handsome accersteps across the stage. Boory strice is exactly the same length." Mr. Bobemian a little jealous): "Yes, that babit of measuring the steps comes from walking on rail way sleeper."

steps comes from waiting on reliway steepets.

Menerty a Scottin Call.—Lady of the House:

"Now you can go shone. I have nothing to give you." Trainp: "Don't get excited, mis, I was presented with a turkey at the last house, and, having found the wish-hous, I have called, thinking you might like to break it with me."

Manna (to Edie, aged three and one half ears, just home from her first morning at the years, jass mole from her tress morning at the kindergarten): "Well, Edie, how did you like it?" Edie: "Ididn't like it a bit. The tember put me on a chair, and told me to sit there for the present. And I sat and sat, and she never gave me the present."

"We must depend on the public," remarked a travelling man, in the course of a castersation. "Can you tell me one thing?" saled his companion. "What is it?" "Who is his companion. "What is it?" "Who is the public?" "Why, that's easy enough. The public is everybody except yourself and the people who employ you.'

"How did you spend the last summer?" "Mow did you spend the hat sommer? asked one travelling man of another whom he had not seen for some time. "Oh, I had a fine time! Never enjoyed my elit more in my life." "What did you do?" "I was campaing out among the northern taken. What did you do?" "A did considerable camping out myseld." "Whereabouts?" "On the frest deep the myseld." "Whereabouts?" "On the frest deep the myseld." "Whereabouts?" "On the frest deep the myseld." door step. My wife we aldn't let me in.

Mas. Dr Prin: "Oh toh t ch ! I shall go distracted." Mr. De Pink (springing so his aide): "Morcital beavens! What me hap-pened?" "The washerwoman has made a mistake, and went me one of Mrs. Westends lace handkerchiefe." Well, what of it?" What of it?" What of it? O youyou — Why, Mrs. Westerd must have redeived my miscrably cheap imitation lace handkerchief, and it has my name on it."

Taken at His Word. Oromwell was thinking of marrying his daughter Frances to a wealthy gentleman of Gloncestershire, when he was led to believe that one of his own chaphe was sen to be been that one or his own cash-hains, Mr. Jeremy White, a young man of pleasing manners, was socretly paying his addresses to Lady Frances, who was far from discouraging his attentions. Entering his discorraging his attentions. Entering his daughter's room one day, the protector caught White on his knoes, kissing the lady's hand. "What is the meaning of this?" Cronwell demanded. "May it please your highness." replied White, with great presence of mind, pointing to one of the lady's maids who happened to be in the room. "I have long courted pened to be in the room, "I have non control that young gentlewoman and ownot pravall; I was, therefore, praying her ladyship to intercede for me." Why do you retue the honour Mr. White would do you?" said Cromwell to the young woman. "He is my Cromwell to the young woman. Ordinwell to the young woman. "He is my friend, and I expect you should treat him as such." "If Mr. White intends me that honour," answered the woman, with a very low courteey, "I shall not be against him." "Sayest thou so, my laws?" "and Cromwell; "call Goodwin—this business shall be done before I go out of the room." Goodwin, the chaplain, arrived, and White was married on the spot to the voung woman. the spot to the young woman.

" Raked ravelling

Oh, no; to live

rido you rtence sa nunley," re you?"

Vote the

ne acte

sexacily (a little ring the leepers." House: thing to d, miss. the last an-bone, like to one half

you like teacher it there and she marked

CORVEL-

Who is elf and mer?'

om he had a campbatidid ng out a frent

nall go

s hap.

stend's thinks to a chspfan of g his from g his aught hand.

mwell ness," mind, hapnried avail;
p to se the

mas that very im.' well; done , the #### SOCIETY.

The Prince of Wales, accompanied by his eldest son, Albert Victor, held the first Levee of the season, on behalf of the Queen, at St. James's Palace. There were only 240 presentations, which cannot be considered a large number. The whole affair was exceedingly dall and uninteresting, but the band gave a little relief to the proceedings, otherwise it might have been imagined that a funeral procession was going on. The West-end was full of oabs and carriages, containing batches of efficers in full uniform, who were driving as if their lives depended on it, in the direction of St. James's Palace.

The Princess of Wales has lately been out tion of St. James's Palsoc.

The Princess of Wales has lately been out several times driving round the Park. She was well wrapped up in furs, as indeed was necessary; has she had the sence not to disgare her face with one of those horrid damon" wells which have a hideone pattern of frogs, touds, and devils sprawling over it, into the intervals of which the colours of the human face fit with the most indicrous effect. She looked very well and youthful, and not the least bit raw and frosty, as most ladies do now when ditiving.

In is becoming a matter of common observation how very wonderfully like the Princess of Wales the Princess Viotoria of Teck is growing, and this is the more remarkable, because the two elder Wales girls are really not very like their mather, and have imberited rather the beavy features of our own Royal needle.

The Dake of Pertland's be-rothed, Miss Dallas Yorke, is a descendant of an old family, the Dallases of Cantray, which trace their lineage back to Sir William de Doleys. In 1617 there was a William Dallasof Cantray who was a life renter of Cantray. He married Agnes Rose, of Kilravock, and on her death, Jamet Campbell, a daughter of the Thane of Cawdor. His eldest won, Alexander, by his first wife, succeeded him in the Cantray property, and his second son, George, founded the family of Dallas of St. Martin's branch that Mr. Thomas Dallas Yorke, of Walmsgate, Dincola, father of the Bules Lancte, is the chief representative, and the young lady who marries the Duke of Portland is his only daughter. Her father added the sumane of Yothe on succeeding to the property of his maternal uncle in 1856.

with respect to the new Duchess of Sutherland Modern Society is responsible for the following facts: Some seventeen odd years ago, Mrs. Blair, the present Duchess of Sutherland, who stands six feet in her silk stockings, was then Mins Mary Mitchell, younger daughter of Doctor Michell, public orator, and later on Principal of Hertford College, who was one of the most popular personalities to be met with in Oxford Society, and that is asying a great deal. Little did Mins Mary Michell in those days imagine that the would ever reach up to the ducal strawberry leaves, and that she would be called upon to preside over the Bories of Stafford House, Trentham, and Dunrobin, as the wife of the premier Earl of Sociland. Yet the turning of the wheel of fortune has brought this most extraordinary and incomprehensible change about, and Miss Mary Mitchell, of Oxford, has been united to George Granville, third Duke of Satherland.

Granville, third Duke of Satherland.

AFIER all the preliminary fass which had been made over the Ice Carnival, the reality was a great disappointment. The bazzar itself was confined to the floor of the Albert Hall, and the "huge" soones of which so much was said were not particularly tall, so that the visitor who entered from Kensington Gore, instead of being "immensely impressed by the striking scene which met his eye," was very much amused to see that he could look right over the "antique castellated gateway."

STATISTICS.

THE life-boats round our coasts during the past year resoned no fewer than six hundred and seventeen persons, the great majority of whom but for the efforts of the gallant crews would have perished.

The following figures abow the devastations caused in the Hungarian vineyards by the Phylloxera:—In 1881, 50 vineyards were infected; this number rose in 1882 to 79, in 1883 to 107, in 1884 to 937, in 1885 to 888, in 1886 to 582, and in 1887 to 811. In 1887, 132 359 acres of land were infected, the area of all the Hungarian vineyards together being 740 000 acres.

Dr. Norman Kran, believing the statement of temperance people to be extravagant that sixty thousand people died annually from the effects of strong drink, began as early as 1870 a personal inquiry, in connection with several medical men and experts, expecting to quickly disprove the same. According to their deductions, the latest estimates of deaths of adults annually caused through intemperance is in Great Britain one hundred and twenty thousand; in France, one hundred and twenty thousand,—or nearly hall a million cach year in three countries aggregating a population of one hundred and twelve million.

GWMS.

Ignorance is the night of the mind, but a night without moon or stars.

The man who sits down and waits to be appreciated will find himself among uncalled-for luggage after the limited express has gone

THE one prudence in life is concentration; the one evil is dissipation; and it makes no difference whether our dissipations are coarse or fine.

WHATEVER you may be sure of, be sure at least of this, that you are very like other people. Human nature has a much greater genius for sameness than for originality.

Ir makes a vast difference with ourselves, as well as with our inpressions of the world whether we are thankful for the roses we find on thorns or complain about the thorns we find among roses.

ROUSEHOLD TREASURES.

APPIN CREAM CARE.—One egg and yelk of another, one cup sugar, and tablespoonful butter, one half, cup milk, one tempoonful of cream tertar, and one-half sods, two cups of flour. Bake in three tins.

Celery.—Scrape clean and out the stalks into inch pieces, cook in boiling salted water till tender. Drain and mix with a white sauce. Celery is usually eaten raw as a salad, but is more digestible when cooked, and is particularly adapted to nervous or racumatic people.

Checolate Care.—One half sup of forter, two caps eagar, one and one half pints of floor, five eags, beaten separately, the whites to a stiff froth, two teaspoonfuls baking powder, and one cup of milk. Rab butter and sugar to a light cream, add the egg yelks; sift the flour wish the powder, and add to the butter, etc., and the milk. Mix into a rather thin batter, and bake in jelly substituted with the powder, in hot oven, fifteen or twenty minutes. For filling between layers: One pint of milk, one tablespoonful butter, one cup sugar, one half cup grated chocolate, two teaspoonful corn starch, yolks of three eggs, one teaspoonful extract vanilla; boil milk, stir in chocolate, sugar and corn flour; boil five minutes. Take from the fire, add agg yolks, stirring rapidly; add butter and then vanilla when cool.

MISCELLANEOUS.

In the centre of the Champs de Mars, at the forthorming Paris Enhibition, there is to be a terrestrial globe about thirteen metres in diameter. It will be a representation of the world on a scale of one millionth—that is to say, a million times smaller than the actual world. To give some idea of the proportion, the city of Paris will barely cover a quare centimetre. The globe will tern en its axis like an ordinary school globe and is certain to form an interesting feature of the Exhibition.

Hue and Cax was the old common law process in England of pursuing "with horn and with voice," from hundred to hundred, and county to county, all robbers and telone. Formerly the hundred was bound to make good all loss occasioned by the robberies there in committed, unless the felon were taken; but by subsequent laws it is made answerable only for damage committed by riotons assemblies. The pursuit of a felon was aided by a description of him in the Hun and Cry, a gazette established for neverthing felons in 1710.

in 1710.

Pone siris to the lungs the most important tonic, and we should see to it that we have sufficient of it in the rooms in which we live and work. Not only must the air space be sufficient, but that air must be constantly renewed it weare to live healthy lives. Nor can the importance of open air exercise be exaggerated. We should accustom ourselves and our children to be out in all weathers and at all temperatures, unless there be some special reason to the contrary. Keep the skin healthy with regular cold bathing, and always wear wool next to it.

With the Finores—The list of things that

With the Froots —The list of things that can be eaten from the diagers is on the increase. It includes all bread, teast, tarts and small cakes, celery and asparagus, when served whole, as it should be, sither, hot or cold; lettuce, which must be drumbled in the diagers and dipped in salt or sauce; clives, to which a fork should never be put any more than a knife should be put to raw oysters; strawberries, when served with stems on as they should be, are touched to pulverized sugar; cheese in sill forms, except Bris or Requefort or Cumbefort, and fruit of all kinds except preserves and melons. The latter should be eaten with a spoon or fook. In the use of ingers greater indulgence is being shown, and you cannot, if you are well bred, make any very bad militake in this direction, especially when the finger bowl stands by you and the very bad mistake in this direction, especially when the finger bowl stands by you and the napkin is bundy.

INTUERED: OF MARKINGE.—Habit and long life together are more necessary to happiness and even to leve, than it generally imagined. No one is happy with the object of his strachment, until he has passed days; and above all, many days of misfortune with her. The married pair must know each other to the centre of their souls—the mysterious vail which bowted the two sponess in the primitive church, must be raised in its immost folds, how electly seever it may be keptdrawn to the rest of the world. What lear account of a fit of captice or burst of passion, am I to be exposed to the lears of lasing my wife and my children, and to renounce the hope of passing my declining days with them? Let no one imagine that fear will make me become a better turband. No; we do not attach our selves to a powersion which we are in danger of lesing—the soul of a man, as well as his body, is incomplete without his wife; he has strength, the has beauty; he combate the enemy and labours in the field, but he understands nothing of domestic life; his comparition is waiting to prepare his repast and awesten his existence. Without woman man would be rade, gross, solitary. Woman spreads anothed her her flowers of existence.

Finally, the Christian pair-five and distunited; in the dast they lie side by side; and they are united beyond the tomb.

No.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ROSIE.—The specimen is fair, but masculine in style.

PUSSY had better leave nature alone; the washes, dyes and beautifiers usually sold are all injurious.

M. H. G.—Keep the corns trimmed, soak the feet in hot water occasionally for some little time, and wear large boots.

Sally.—Brush your hair frequently, and have it cut and washed regularly. You write a fair, but rather childish hand.

Frances W. had better leave arenic alone. It is a deadly polson, and should never be taken except under proper medical advice.

M. Ross —1. The money and the value of the furniture would be divided equally between the children. 2. The 29th September, 1862, fell on a Monday.

MAY.—Polite reticence on the subject was better than anything you could have said. But you should, of course, not expose yourself to such treatment again.

F. D.—Keep quiet until the girl gets over her angry feelings sufficiently to give you a chance to talk the matter over with her. Then it will probably all come right.

NELLY. - Probably if you like to write to the postmarker of the town named, enclosing a stamped addressed enrelops, he might oblige you. We regret we cannot supply the information.

Nona H.—There is no special meaning attached to them. It simply implies that the glands in that particular portion do not give out the usual colouring matter. It is not at all uncommon.

C. N.—You had better defer marriage until you are twenty-one years of age, and have more experience and wisdom. You are no match for a widow of twenty-five, Your parents should attend to your case.

ROLL 7.—The iron crown of Lombardy is known to be more than 1,000 years old, and no crown of precious metal and rarest gens has ever been sought so cannestly by sovereigns. It has been worn by Charlemagno, Barbarossa and Napoleon the Great. Its last possessor was the Emperor of Austria, who, when he resigned the title of King of Lombardo Venetia, gave the precious relic to the late Victor Emmanuel.

w. J. W.—By no means reply to the advertisements offering ladles remunerative employment at their own homes, or you may indeed prove a victim. From the tone of your letter and handwriting you seem to have been well educated, and, far better, to have a proper feeling. Can you not obtain the employment you seek from one of the houses in your own town or its vicinity? Steadfastly make the attempt, have patience, and, believe us, you will not fail.

M. M.—You are right: it is necessary to reduce the compound fractions in order to find the least common denominator, to which all the fractions can be reduced, and which in this case is 960. It is not necessary, however, to reduce the mixed numbers to improper fractions, in order to find the least common denominator, but before reducing the fractions to this least common denominator, it is usually convenient to reduce such mixed numbers as a preliminary step.

mixed numbers as a preliminary step.

S. N.—Most precious stones are characterised by their hardness. The diamond is the hardest substance known, and the varieties of corundum, such as rubles, sapphires, emeralds, and oriental amethysts, come next. The common amethyst is only coloured quarts, and although too hard to be scratched with a knile, yields to the file, with some difficulty. If you find any pebble which will scratch the smooth surface of a six-sided pyramid of rock crystal, you may be pretty sure that you have a precious stone, but its money value depends on its clearness and brilliancy. A "rough" diamond has little to distinguish it to the eye from a small quarts gebble.

A. H.—The contents of the Old Testament were determined by the Jawish Rabbis thousands of years ago, and in the main their arrangement of its various books as still followed. The books of the Now Testament were selected by the learned Fathers of the Christian Church, after vast and prolonged study of the subject. The Bible, as it stands to-day, is believed by the chief authorities in Christendom to contain all the inspired books given to man under the Jewish and the Christian Dispensations. Some small sects, and also some individual critics, dissent from this generally accepted opinion, but their dissent has but little, if any induces on the main current of religious belief.

influence on the main current of religious belief.

M. D. M.—It is only a popular designation given for convenience, to the distinct but associated gases which proceed from foul places. The most malodorous of these gases is sulphuretted hydrogen. Fortunately it is heavier than common air, and does not rise to do the deadly work, though its offensive smell impregnates the air for a long distance. Carbonia cati gas is another component of the so-called sower gas. This is as fatal to life as sulphuretted hydrogen, but, like the latter, remains for the most part at the bottom of the sower, cosspool, or stagnant well. The papers often give accounts of the death of workmen who are actually drowned by sinking unawares into a deposit or pool of this pondsrous gus. It is some lighter gas, like ammonia or hydrogen, that emanates freely from bad places. Such a gas brings up with it the germs of typhold fever, diphtheria, and some other virulent diseases—these death-seeds being, in an unknown manner, yielded by the decomposing substances that abound in such places.

J. B. S.—Wash your hands frequently in a tolerably strong solution of borax and water.

R. I. F.—1. Golden brown hair—a fitting crown to a face that is doubtless beautiful. 2. Fine penmanship.

S. S. W.—To remove proud flesh, pulverise loaf sugar very fine, and apply it to the part affected. Good writing.

ETTLE.—It is a very common thing for cousins to marry. There is no law against it. Her Mejesty married a cousin.

L. S.—A slight bow is all that courtesy requires after an introduction. Hand-shaking is optional, and it abould rest with the older, or the superior in social standing, to make the advances.

W. K.—1. A tempoonful of powdered charcoal in half a glass of water will sometimes correct a bad breath. Ropeas the dose, if necessary. 2. Charcoal powder mixed with prepared chalk will help to clean and whiten the teeth.

A. A. J.—If the young lady you refer to were engaged she would not probably allow you to pay her such marked attention—at least she should not. Avail yourself of the first opportunity to make your sentiments towards her known.

D. D.—The growth and strength of the hair depends greatly upon the healthfulness of the individual, and consequently no preparation can be counted upon as sure. Washing it with a mixture of bay-rum and alum will, it is said, improve its growth.

will, it is said, improve its growth.

F. F. -1. The average height of the English mastiff is from 25 to 31 inches; weight, from 100 to 150 pounds. The German boarhound, which is also known as the Great Dane and Ulmer dog, is the original cross from which sprang the so-called prison bloothound of this country. They are from 24 to 31 inches high, and weigh from 30 to 100 pounds. 2. The coin is not described plainly enough to admit of a recognition.

DISAPPOINTED,

For every moment's joy
There is an hour of pain.
The soul, from glimpse of paradise,
Comes back to earth again.

But yesterday there came to me A ray of love's own light; To-day 'tis gone, and shadows fall Just where the way was bright.

But yesterday the heavens oped And let their brightness down; Upon my heart, to-day, I stand 'Neath heaven's darkening frown.

One glimpse of sunshins—vanished, fled, Leaving the day more drear, Because I know the joy I craved Had come so very near.

So, back from paradise, my soul Falls, on her weary wing; And, disappointed, waits on earth, Whate'er the hours may bring.

A. L. P

L. L. N.—Possession of land for twenty years, by a person claiming full title, gives such person the absolute ownership, provided that another person, entitled to claim, has not been during part of that time a minor, or otherwise legally disabled from asserting his right. If, however, our correspondent refers, as we infer he does, to the length of time necessary to give the public an indefeasible right to land covered by a highway, much less time is required if the owner, by acquiescence in its use as a highway, makes a delication of it for such a purpose. Even six years has been held sufficient.

sufficient.

W. C. W.—To remove pitting and old pockmarks, simple oil, pomade, or ointment, medicated with croton oil, and of a strength just sufficient to raise a very alight pustular cruption, is probably the affect, most effective, and convenient of all preparations employed for the purpose. It has been successfully used in France, and has received the approval of the medical fraternity of that country. It should be applied at intervals extending over several weeks, as the feelings and convenience of the party treated may indicate, due care being taken in its application. It would be better before applying the mixture to consult a physician as to the advisability of the step.

(I. 8.8.—The following is the regime for which you to the advisability of the step.

C. S. S.—The following is the recipe for which you make inquiry: A chemist is the proper person to compound it. Sulphate of from five grains; manesia, ten grains; peppermint-water, eleven drachms; spirit of nutmeg, one drachm. To be taken twice a day. This preparation acts as a stimulant and tonic, and thus partially supplies the place of habitual drinking, while also preventing that absolute physical prostration following a sudden breaking off from the use of stimulating drinks. As a matter of course, the virtue of this preparation requires the unbriate to make a resolution to break off from his absolute to make a resolution to break off from his habitual intemperance, and then aids him, as a harmless and pleasant makeshift, during his season of weakness and suffering from the want of the oustomary stimulant. It should be borne in mind that a confirmed drunkard cannot be cured of his disease in spite of and unknown to himself. He must make up his mind to stop short in his downward career, and with the help of the above preparation will be very likely to conquer the appetite for strong drink.

L. L.—A person of such an age as twenty-one has no cause for being dissatisfied with life, unless weighed down by some great sorrow, as the loss of parents or other dear relatives. We think that should you state your trouble to a physician he would pronounce it to be caused by a disordered liver, and prescribe scoordingly. It may be a severe attack of love-sickness, in which event we would recommend marriage at as early a date as possible.

as possible.

C. J. W.—The reaches may be caught at night by filling a percelain bowl or weak-basin two-thirds full of sweetened water, acting it on the floor, and laying attoke of lathe up to the edge. It is a regular may fine insects as up the sticks, go down includents, and caonot set out. All found in the bowl much, and the trep set out. All found in the bowl much, and the trep set again at night. In this way and with no further remedy the whole stock of these pests may be annihilated.

De annihited.

JOE.—Terra (* Tierra) del Fuego means the "land of fire." It is so named on account of the numerous volcanic mountains found within its limits. This archipelago, situated at the extreme south of South America, from the mainland of which it is separated by Magellan's Stratts, consists of eleven large islands (the principal one being called King Charles's South Land) and about twenty lalets. It was discovered by Magellan in 1830, who gave it the name it still bears. Some writers call it the "land of desolation"—a most appropriate title.

V. D.—J. De not allow your mind to dwall upon the it the "land of desolation"—a most appropriate title, V. D.—I. Do not allow your mind to dwell upon the fact that your plainness is the cause of remark among certain people, who, we are inclined to believe, are jealous of your sunsy temperament and genial manners.

These are greater and more lasting possessions than a pretty face, and serve as a magnet to attract sensible people to you. In fact, they will always serve as a saided upon which the barbs of jealousy are quickly broken. 2. The general appearance of your communication is very creditable, more especially as to pennanship. 3. Light brown.

ship. 3. Light brown.

L. L.—Follow these directions, and a fine batch of scrapple will be the result: Take eight pounds of scrapps of pork, that will not do for sausage, boil in four gallons of water; when tender, chop fine, strain the liquor, and pour back into the pot. Then put in the meat, season it with sage, sammer savory, alt and pepper to taste, and stir in a quart of meal. After simmering a few minutes, make very thick by the addition of flour. It requires but very little boiling after this, but must be stirred constantly. Pour into deep pans or dishes, and allow it to cool.

M. E. E. Lit is impossible for any one to be "poil."

deep pans or dishes, and allow it to cool.

M. E. E.—It is impossible for any one to be "positively sure" as to the result of any course of medical treatment. Persons who had been addicted to the excessive use of opium for years have been greatly helped by some of the physicians who have given that subject special study. The cure is moral, as well as medical. The patient's will have to be strengthened so that he can resist the appetite; and if his will power cannot be restored, then his case is usually hopeless. What the result would be in your case can only be ascertained by actual experiment; and we most sincerefy hope that it will be as favourable as you could wish.

could wish.

E. F. N.—1. For silver weddings a light blue paper is used with letterings and designs in silver, somewhat claborately executed; but for golden ones, gold ornamentation, much platner. 2 A very appropriate design consists of branches, the linden signifying constancy. 3. There is no change in the style of invitation for atteneou teas, and those for archery, yachting, and lawtennis are treated symbolically in the character of their designs as formerly. 4. For children's gatherings, a small nute sheet, headed by a coloured design which signifies the character of the party, such as a Christmat tree, a Mar-pole, or some well-kinown personages from "Mother Goose," bears the invitation.

"Mother Goose," bears the invitation.

A. L. E.—The electrical apparatus used to give "shocks" is usually a frictional machine, not a batter, while that used for medical purposes is frequently a little magnetic machine, which is really a small dynamo. The simplest frictional machine consists of a large, circular glass plate, turning on a horisontal axis, supported by two wooden uprights. On each side of the plate, on the uprights which support the axis, are cushions pressing against the plate as it is turned, and an producing the friction which generates the electricity. In front of the plate are two metallic conductors, supported on glass legs, to receive the charge. It would be necessary to give you drawings to enable you to construct such a machine, and we refer you to Everett's translation of Deschanel's "Natural Philosophy" for further information.

THE LONDON READER, Post-free. Three-halfpence. Weekly; or Quarterly One Shilling and Eightpence.

ALL BACK NUMBERS, PARTS and VOLUMES are in print, and may be had of all booksellers.

NOTICE.—Part 326, Now Ready, price Sixpence, post free, Eightpence. Also Vol. LI., bound in cloth, 4s. 6d.

THE LONDON READER, 334, Strand, W.C.

† We cannot undertake to return rejected manuscripts.

London: Published for the Proprietor, at 334, Strand, by J. R. Speck; and Printed by Woodpall and Kinder, 70 to 76, Long Acre, W.C.